The appeal to antiquity is simply superstition, cruelty, and absurdity, appealing to superstition, cruelty and absurdity—Many superstitious and absurd opinions and practices specified as having obtained in the nominally Christian Church at a very early period—It is difficult to mention any one religious dogma that is more clogged with difficulties than is the dogma of Plunging. 60

Summing up—A great variety of Particulars are Specified—Plunging was, and is, connected with Superstition and various Errors, and is doubtless the Offspring of Superstition—Proselyting, causing Proselytes to Renounce their Baptism is very serious—Unreasonableness of the supposition that the German Fanatics discovered what all the wise and the learned both ancient and modern have failed to discover—It is the duty of Zion's Watchmen to save their People from being Proselyted—The sincerity of the Anabaptists in crying for Union under certain circumstances, is very questionable while they teach as they do—We are not at liberty to reject a Divinely-appointed Method and adopt another, especially when that other is very objectionable in itself—Nor is the Church at Liberty to leave to the choice and whims of Men to Decide where it is her duty to Teach what God has already Decided—Taylor's Pictorial Representations showing the Ancient mode of Baptism. . . . . 66

REPLY TO REVIEW ON THE MODE.

The Reviewer contradicts himself by professing to believe that this work will incline many to embrace the Anabaptist faith after he had told us that Mr. A. was "very much interested, edified and comforted," by reading it, so much so that it required a mighty effort on the part of the reviewer to convert him back again!—He again argues on the assumption that bapto always means to dip, plunge or immerse; and yet afterward denies that Baptists ever assume this—It is shown that neither dip, plunge, dlive, immerse, pour or sprinkle, is the synonym of baptize—He asserts that bapto is never used for

Christian Baptism, though Baptist writers say this word always means to dip, plunge or immerse—The word ebaphe used by the seventy in Daniel, is again taken up—What I say about plunging, and plunging naked, is merely evaded—It is shown, however, that the more intelligent of the Anabaptists admit the difficulty involved in the assumption that the baptisms recorded in the New Testament were by plunging; as an instance, Robert Hall is quoted—It is admitted to be only probable that New Testament baptisms were by plunging—Quotations from New Translation and criticisms thereon.....161

CHAPTER XVII.

REPLY TO REVIEW ON THE MODE.

The Reviewer fails to show the existence of an Antipedobaptist Church before that founded by the German fanatics—They must accept of these fanatics as the fathers of their system, or be without known parents, while our practice is traced to the Apostles—Having shown the terrible consequences of applying to infants what was intended for adults only, the Reviewer utterly fails to avoid those consequences, and even involves himself in other difficulties—He even denies that circumcision was a sign and seal—It is admitted that infant baptism was practiced in the middle of the second century—It is in vain that his system seeks help from Tertullian—His singular criticism upon the testimony of Irenæus, and the reply thereto—His feeble attempt to meet the argument based upon the Greek words, oikos and oikia, and the answer thereto—It is again admitted that infant baptism was practiced all but universally in the middle of the second century—Soon after he asserts the contrary—Another singular and entirely unsuccessful attempt to find an Antipedobaptist society before the German fanatics—The Donatists and Nova'ians are claimed as their ancestors—In reply, the history of those heretical sects is given—Bad as these sects were, there is no evidence that they were Antipedobaptists—Our principal arguments are either ignored or merely evaded—The statement, "We will have no inference, nothing but positive command," is examined, and its weakness exposed—It is with a bad grace that the Anabaptists make the statement, seeing their system rests entirely upon inference or assumption.....200

IN referring to the denomination with whose teachings I join issue, it was necessary, of course, to use some distinctive appellation. I did not think it proper to use the appellation Baptist, for that term is calculated and designed to convey the idea that the denomination to which it is applied is the only denomination that baptizes at all. But so far is this from being true that it would be more in harmony with truth to call them Antibaptists, seeing they are opposed to the baptism of children, that is, to the baptism of the whole human race till a given period is reached. I have, therefore, used the appellation Anabaptists, as they were originally and properly called, because they rebaptized. I have also used the appellation Antipedobaptists, because they are opposed to the baptism of children. And, for the sake of convenience, I have sometimes used the appellation Immersionists, though, strictly speaking, that is not correct, for they do not immerse, as we have shown, but they plunge, and plunge only; but we did not like to use the appellation plungers, though it would be a truthful appellation, but it has a strange want of euphony about it.

While I have endeavored to bring the subject within the grasp of ordinary capacities, so that even the Sabbath-school scholar may read and understand, there is, however, in the work, matter for the thinker, and even for the critic. The style, too, I think, is so easy and racy, and the matter so varied, that the reader will not find it a dull book; especially as I have introduced a considerable amount of incident, and historic fact, that are entirely relevant, and interesting. It will be seen, too, that I have endeavored to press into the smallest compass everything that is of importance, and relevant to the subject. Hence, I have divided the entire work into two grand divisions; the first treating of the mode, and the second of the subjects of baptism. To make it, as far as may be, adapted to all readers, I have caused most of the Greek words, though not all, to be printed in English characters.

In view of the things here specified, I think the work here offered to the public really meets a want that was felt; for while many good works have been written on this subject, and I am much indebted to them, some of them have been too verbose and complicated, while others have been too meager, so that neither kind had sufficient clearness and point.

The first edition having been reviewed by an advocate of the views here objected to, I have written a reply thereto, and that reply will be found in the two last chapters of the book. By this review an opportunity was given me, it is believed, to answer every objection and argument, of any importance, that our opponents could bring forward. So that the reader is here furnished with everything of weight connected with this subject, both pro and con.

Finally, as I said formerly, so I say now, if any person, after carefully reading this little work, will honestly say to me, "I still believe that the views here objected to are the right views," I here promise that I will cheerfully return to such the price of the book, and take it back.

CHRISTIAN BAPTISM—THE MODE.

CHAPTER I.

Position of Anabaptists Stated—The words Dip, Plunge, Immerse, Overwhelm, not Synonymous—They give us the word Plunge as the Synonym of Baptize, and their practice is to Plunge, and Plunge only—Their favorite Arguments drawn from the Baptism by John and that by Philip—John's Baptism not Christian Baptism—Christ's Baptism different from both—Their Arguments based upon a mere Assumption—Their Assumption is shown to involve palpable Absurdities—It is disproved and shown to be a mere begging of the question.

The position of the Anabaptists with regard to the mode of baptism, is this. They say, "Baptism is neither more nor less than an immersion of the whole body in water, solemnly performed in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Their arguments in favor of this position are usually commenced thus, by their writers: "BAPTISM, from the Greek word Baptizo, or Bapto—I dip or plunge." "To dip, plunge or immerse." They also use the word overwhelm, and sometimes other words which they consider synonymous with these. Baptize, dip, plunge, immerse, overwhelm. It is assumed that these five terms are synonymous, but we deny that any one of them is synonymous with any other one of the five terms. It is not necessary, however, to refute this unwarrantable assumption, seeing it is plunging and plunging only, that is practiced by those with whom we join issue, nor do I know any other word in the English language that expresses their practice quite as well as this one does; submerge is the next best. Be this as it may, however, their practice is to plunge under water, and this and this only, they assert, is baptism; and they say the Greek word baptizo means this, "neither more nor less." It is necessary that this should be distinctly noticed, as Baptists, so called, seem to prefer the word immerse, though it is a somewhat ambiguous word, and does not fairly express their practice. Inasmuch, then, as this word is that which best expresses their practice, and as they claim it to be the synonym of baptize, we will use it in these discussions, as appropriately expressing that for which they contend, and to which we object.

The most favorite arguments of the Anabaptists in favor of plunging are drawn from the record of the baptism by John, and from the record of the baptism by Philip, and are all based upon the assumption, that certain words have the meaning which they attach to them, and no other. Now we purpose to prove that the reverse of this assumption is true, and will thus take away the very foundation of their arguments, and render them worthless.

As John's baptism is so much relied upon by the Anabaptists, it may be well, just here to call attention to the fact that his baptism was not Christian Baptism, and, consequently, cannot properly be claimed as a pattern for Christians to go by. The following remarks will suffice to show that John's baptism was not Christian baptism. 1. John's baptism was "unto repentance," and the parties baptized professed faith in a Savior to come. 2. Christian baptism is the initiatory right into the Christian Church; but when John baptized the Christian Church had no existence. 3. While John's baptism was "unto repentance," Christian baptism is the seal of justification already received, as circumcision was. Hence when those who had been baptized by John, believed, and were justified in the Christian sense, the Apostles administered Christian baptism to them, as we learn from the following Scripture: "Paul having passed through the upper coasts, came to Ephesus; and finding certain disciples, he said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. And he said unto them, Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, Unto John's baptism. Then said Paul, John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus. When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus." Acts xix. 1-5.; see also Matt. iii. 5. It is entirely unnecessary to say any more to prove that John's baptism was not Christian baptism. And as the baptism of our blessed Lord is constantly referred to by the Anabaptists, who tell us that we must follow Jesus, it may be well to remark that neither was that Christian baptism, nor was it the same as that which John administered to his countrymen; it could not be unto repentance, for Jesus had no sin to repent of, neither could it be the seal of his justification, for he never was pardoned; nor was it the right of initiation into the Christian Church, for the Christian Church did not yet exist; but like the Jewish high-priest, he was thus initiated into the priests' office; it was also the sign of the baptism by the Holy Ghost, and that was administered by the Spirit "descending upon him." Thus we might fairly reject all the arguments drawn from John's baptism without saying any more. We will not, however, rest our cause here, but will now proceed to refute their assumption, viz., that the words baptizo, en, eis, and ek have the meaning which they say they have, and no other.

We now take up the word baptizo; and here let it be distinctly noticed that the advocates of plunging as the only mode of baptism, give us the word plunge as the synonym of the word baptize, and their practice is plunging, and only plunging; nor will they admit that anything short of this is baptism. We have nothing to do, then, with the words dip, immerse, overwhelm, or any other; their use only tends to deceive; baptizo we are told means to plunge the whole body under, and their practice corresponds with the assertion; they do not dip, they do not immerse, they plunge only!

The question, then, is simply this: Does baptizo mean to plunge, "neither more nor less?" To refute this assumption we have only to quote a few texts where the word occurs, and substitute the word plunge for the word baptize.

Luke xvi. 24. "Send Lazarus that he may plunge the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue." John xiii. 26. "He to whom I shall give a sop when I have plunged it." Rev. xix. 13. "He was clothed in a vesture plunged in blood." Matt. xxvi. 23. "He that plungeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me." Mark xiv. 20. "One of the twelve that plungeth with me in the dish." John xiii. 26. "He it is to whom I shall give a sop when I have plunged it." Mark vii. 4, 8. "And when they come from market, except they plunge they eat not. And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, as the plunging of cups, and pots, and brazen vessels, and tables." The word klinon, here translated tables, means, more properly, couches, or beds; more especially those couches or lounges upon which the Jews reclined at their tables; these were, say, fourteen feet long, more or less. Now what do you think of plunging these lounges, or tables under water before eating? The idea is so absurd that the mere mention of it is sufficient. But this is only one of the numerous absurdities implied in the assumption to which we object. It will be remembered, of course, that baptismos in this passage is rendered washing by our translators, but the assumption to which we object will have it plunging! But we proceed. Heb. ix. 10. "Divers plungings, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation." Heb. vi. 2. "Of the doctrine of plungings, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment." What think you of the doctrine of plungings? Matt. iii. 11.

"I indeed plunge you with water unto repentance ; but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear. He shall plunge you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." If the advocates of plunging insist on the substitution of in for with, then the reading will be "He shall plunge you in the Holy Ghost and in fire !" If they prefer this rendering they are welcome to it. But we think men of sober judgment will not hesitate to pronounce both renderings absurd and intolerable. Yet this must be the rendering or the assumption to which we object must be given up. "Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be plunged of him. But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be plunged of thee, and comest thou to me?" Acts. xi. 16. "Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed plunged in water ; but ye shall be plunged in the Holy Ghost." Nothing prevents such language from being blasphemy but the good intention of those who use it. In Matt. xx. 22, 23, it is difficult to get the word plunge in at all ; but if we substitute the word plunge for the word baptize, these verses will read thus : "Are ye able to be plunged with the plunging that I am plunged with ?" "Ye shall drink indeed of my cup, and be plunged with the plunging that I am plunged with." Mark i. 4. "John did plunge in the wilderness, and preach the plunging of repentance for the remission of sins." John xii. 50. "But I have a plunging to be plunged with ; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished." Acts x. 37. "That word, I say, ye know, which was published throughout all Judea, and began from Galilee, after the plunging which John preached." Acts xiii. 24. "John preached the plunging of repentance to all the people of Israel." In Acts xix. 3, we read, "And he said unto them, Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, Unto John's baptism." The word here rendered unto, is, in the original, eis, and the advocates of plunging rest their arguments, as we shall show by-and-by, upon the assumption that eis always means into; now let us substitute into for unto, in this verse, and plunge for baptize, as they claim we should, and the passage will read thus: "And he said unto them, into what then were ye plunged? And they said, into John's plunging!" Now who but an ignorant fanatic would charge the inspired writers with talking such consummate nonsense as this translation indicates? And, remember, this is the correct translation if the assumption here opposed be true; and it is to obtain such a translation as this that the Anabaptists have got up their new Bible! 1 Cor. xii. 13. "For by one spirit are we all plunged into one body." Once more, according to this assumption, Rom. vi. 3 and 4 will read thus: "Know ye not that so many of us as were plunged into Jesus Christ, were plunged into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by plunging into death."

We think we have now given plunging enough to satisfy the most ardent lover of plunging; nay, we think enough has been given to make the most ardent lover of plunging sick of it! We beg to assure the reader, however, that much more of the same kind might be given; what is here given is a mere tithe of the absurdities involved in the assumption that baptizo always means to plunge, "neither more nor less!" We are aware that the better informed among the Anabaptists admit that baptizo has other meanings; but, notwithstanding this, their arguments are based upon the assumption that this is its only meaning; and they give us the word plunge as its synonym; and they practice plunging and plunging only! Moreover, we deny that either the word dip or the word immerse, properly expresses their practice, nor does overwhelm, for you may overwhelm a man by casting abundance of water, sand, or other substance upon him, but that is not plunging, and, consequently, not baptism, if the assumption under consideration be correct; and if it is not correct, not true, as it evidently is not, all the arguments which assume its truthfulness, and depend upon such assumption for their validity and conclusiveness, are worthless; till the point assumed is proved, all such arguments are a mere begging of the question. In conclusion, we beg to remind the reader that the word PLUNGE, in its different forms, in the above remarks, represents the word baptizo, in its corresponding forms in the original; and if the substitution of the one word for the other involves us in absurdities, and even implies impossibilities, as it evidently does, then to baptize does not mean to plunge, and the assumption that it does is not true, and all the arguments built upon that assumption, are worthless, are a mere begging of the question. This is what we claim to have proved, and this is what we undertook to prove, in this chapter.

CHAPTER II.

Direct Argument taken up—That which God calls Baptism shown to be administered by the baptismal element Falling upon the Subject—This is claimed to be a Fact—What God Asserts Baptists Deny—God Baptizes by Pouring—This, too, is a Fact—His Precept and his practice Against Plunging.

We will now proceed to the direct evidence in the case, and will show that what God calls baptism is administered by the baptismal element falling upon the party baptized, not by the party being plunged in that element; and will, consequently, prove that the mode contended for and practiced by the Anabaptists, is just the reverse of God's mode.

In Daniel iv. 33, we read: "The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet [ebaphe] with the dew of heaven." Now, here is no plunging; yet Nebuchadnezzar was baptized. How was he baptized? The Seventy tell you in these words: "his body was baptized with the dew of heaven." Now, everybody knows that "the dew of heaven" fell upon his body, and God calls this baptism. Nor can the Anabaptists force en, or eis, into their service in this case, for neither of these prepositions is found here; the record is, that "his body was baptized with the dew of heaven." See Septuagint, Chap. iv. 30. It is worthy of remark, too, that the descent and influences of the Spirit upon the human soul are compared to the descent and influences of the rain, and of the dew upon vegetation; hence, we read thus in Ps. lxxii. 6: "He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass; as showers that water the earth." And in Hosea iv. 5, we read: "I will be as the dew unto Israel, he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon." This is what God calls the baptism with the Spirit, and the falling of the dew upon Nebuchadnezzar is baptism with dew, or water. Yet this is what the advocates of plunging despise, treat with contempt, and pronounce no baptism. It is enough for us, however, to know that God calls it baptism; and that he calls it baptism is a fact, an indisputable fact; for we give his words, and the chapter and verse where they may be found. And, while the descent of the Spirit is compared to the descent of water in the form of rain or dew, we aver that it never is, and cannot be compared to plunging the body into the water, nor is it ever compared to a dash of water overwhelming the body: such figures are of human invention, and, like all other errors, flow from the carnal nature, which always seeks for a great display, and loses the Spirit in the letter! To such Jesus still has to say: "The flesh profiteth nothing, the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." And to such Paul says: "Are ye not yet carnal and walk as men?" We will now produce another text to prove that what God calls baptism was administered by the baptismal element falling upon the parties baptized. In 1 Cor. x. 1, 2, Paul says: "All our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea." Paul says, "all passed through the sea;" and Moses says, "The children of Israel walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea." Now, here was no plunging; the people were "under the cloud," and "upon dry land in the midst of the sea;" consequently the water with which they were baptized must have fallen upon them, whether it came from the cloud, which was suspended over them, or from the sea, which was "a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left." Here, again, was no plunging; the Israelites were not plunged in the cloud, for that was over them; nor in the sea, for the waters were "a wall," on either hand, while they "walked upon dry land." Their number was six hundred thousand men, beside women and children. To talk about plunging all these either in the cloud or in the sea is preposterous, yet they were all baptized, and they were baptized by sprinkling, and this sprinkling God calls baptism. This, too, is a fact, an indisputable fact! Neither were the Egyptians plunged, they were overwhelmed with a vengeance; but, observe, God does not call the overwhelming of the Egyptians baptism, but the sprinkling of the Israelites he does! Yet Anabaptists treat sprinkling with sovereign contempt, and are wont to say of those who were baptized by sprinkling, "They were sprinkled, not baptized." In a word, that which God calls baptism they say is no baptism; what God affirms, they deny; these are the facts in the case!

Having shown that sprinkling, or pouring, is baptism, that God says it is, we now declare that we do not find a single text in God's book where that mode of baptism practiced by the Anabaptists is enjoined, nor do I remember a single text wherein plunging is called baptism; if there is, let the advocates of plunging produce it; but, remember, if they should produce fifty such texts, it will not affect our argument, for still the fact claimed remains the same, viz.: that, sprinkling, or pouring, is baptism—God says it is. Nor does God ever plunge when He baptizes, He always baptizes by pouring, sprinkling, shedding, falling, as we shall now show.

The baptism of the Spirit, and more especially that peculiar baptism which belongs to the times of the Gospel, is thus spoken of and promised by the prophets. Isaiah xlv. 3: "For I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground: I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring." Here the sign, water, and the thing signified, the Spirit, are both spoken of, and the administration of each is said to be by pouring: "I will pour water," "I will pour my Spirit." It is quite evident that the pouring of water mentioned in this text represents the outpouring of the Spirit—the prophet, or rather the LORD, explains the one by the other. The same baptism is spoken of in the following prophetic promise: "And it shall come to pass afterward, that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions; and also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out my Spirit." In these and similar Scriptures we have what our Lord calls "The promise of the Father," and what He and his apostles call the baptism of the Spirit. I do not know that this statement will be questioned as to its correctness, but if it should the following texts will put it beyond question. Luke xxiv. 49: "And behold I send the promise of my Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." Acts i. 4, 5: "He commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me. For John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence." In these prophetic promises there are two particulars to which, more especially, we call attention. First, the thing promised, baptism: "Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." Second, that baptism was to be administered by pouring: "I will pour out my Spirit;" and the same is said of the outward and visible sign of this baptism, the baptism with water: "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty." It is evident, according to these prophetic promises, that baptism, in every sense of the word, was to be by pouring. This, too, we claim to be a fact!

Let us now turn to the New Testament and see how these prophetic promises were fulfilled. Acts ii. 1-4: "And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place; And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost." Observe, the parties baptized on this occasion were all in one room and remained unmoved till baptized—there was no plunging. Second, The sound "filled all the house where they were sitting;" observe, they were sitting when baptized. Third, the Holy Ghost filled the parties baptized; and, fourth, the symbol sat upon each of them; and, finally, all came from above. Now, this is what God calls baptism; and it was administered by pouring, by falling, as both the prophets and Jesus Christ said it would be. There was no plunging!

Now, when Peter witnessed all this he "Lifted up his voice and said unto them: Ye men of Judea, and all ye that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken to my words;" "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel, And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh;" "And on my servants, and on my handmaidens, I will pour out, in those days, of my Spirit." Here the Apostle Peter declares that the prophetic promise, quoted above, the promise of the Father, was fulfilled by this pentecostal baptism of the Spirit; and this baptism was by pouring, as the foregoing prophecy said it would be.

Here let it be remembered that the Anabaptists assert, that baptizo means to plunge, and that it means "neither more nor less;" hence they practice plunging, and plunging only, and assert that pouring, sprinkling, is no baptism! But it is an indispensable fact that the Spirit was poured out and fell upon the disciples, upon the day of Pentecost while they were sitting! And it is a fact equally indisputable, that Jesus Christ and his apostles, and the whole Christian Church from then till now, call this baptism! Here, then, is baptism without plunging; here is baptism by pouring; let Anabaptists pronounce it no baptism if they dare! If they do, they contradict Jesus and His apostles, together with those who were eye and ear witnesses of the facts, as well as the whole Christian Church from then till now! And if they admit that this is baptism, they thereby admit that baptism is administered by pouring—administered by the baptismal element falling upon the parties baptized; and by this admission they concede all we claim, and give up the controversy! Upon one of the horns of this dilemma we suspend all the opposers of baptism by pouring; they may choose which they please, for either is fatal to their cause, and they must choose one or the other! If they deny that this is baptism, they are infidels, for Jesus and His apostles say it is; and if they admit that pouring is baptism, they admit all we claim, and the controversy is at an end.

But knowing the obtuseness of those who will not admit of anything short of plunging for baptism, we will add fact to fact, and text to text, if by any means we may convince them of their error, and lead them to an acknowledgment of the truth.

In Acts xi. 15-17, the baptism at the house of Cornelius is thus recorded by Peter: "And as I began to speak, the Holy Ghost fell upon them, as upon us at the beginning. Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift as He did unto us, who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, what was I, that I could withstand God?"

Here let the following particulars be noticed. 1. God baptized, on this occasion, at the house of Cornelius, in the same way that He baptized at Jerusalem, on the day of Pentecost; "The Holy Ghost fell on them as He did on us at the beginning." In each case the baptismal element fell upon them—they were not plunged in it. 2. The administration in each case is called baptism. John baptized, and God baptized. 3. The latter reminded Peter of the former; therefore, as we know that the latter was by pouring, we infer that the mode in the former case was the same, for pouring could not remind any one of plunging. If a Baptist should see one baptizing another by pouring, would he say that it reminded him of John baptizing by plunging in Jordan? And if such an association of ideas in the mind of a modern Baptist would be considered absurd, and even impossible, let such admit that it would be equally absurd and impossible in the mind of Peter. Thus we are forced to admit that John's baptism with water was similar to God's baptism with the Holy Ghost, or charge Peter with an association of ideas at once absurd and impossible! Moreover, we know that God baptized by pouring, and we defy any man to prove that John baptized by plunging! Seeing, then, that the latter is unknown, to say the least, and the former confessedly KNOWN, common sense says follow the known rather than the unknown; follow what we KNOW to be God's mode of baptizing rather than what we do not know to be John's mode! It follows, then, it inevitably follows, that we have this advantage over the immersionists; we follow what we KNOW to be God's mode of baptizing, they follow what they cannot prove to be John's mode. And even if they could prove that John administered the rite by plunging, which they can not do, still they must concede to us all we claim, namely: that pouring or sprinkling properly administered is baptism, FOR GOD SAYS IT IS. And even though they could prove that the apostles administered baptism by plunging, which they can not, still the fact remains, sprinkling or pouring properly administered is baptism, for God says it is, and by pouring, He Himself has invariably administered baptism. At best, the claim of the Anabaptists rests upon inference, conjecture, or assumption; ours upon the precept and practice of the Almighty. Nor would it avail if the Anabaptists could prove that John baptized by plunging, for it would not follow that we should, seeing his was not Christian baptism, as we have already shown. It follows, finally, that the Anabaptists must concede that we are right, unless they can prove that God is wrong, for both His teaching and His practice are in favor of sprinkling and pouring. This is fact, not conjecture, not mere inference, not mere assumption!

It really does appear to us that it would be difficult, very difficult, even to conceive of argument more complete than is our argument in favor of baptism by sprinkling or pouring.

We have shown on the testimony of God's own word, that our mode of baptizing is God's mode, while the Anabaptists cannot show that plunging was John's mode; we say they cannot; it is not possible for them to do so. And even if they could, that would not prove that plunging is the right, much less the only mode of Christian baptism; nor would it affect our position at all, for still it would remain a fact, that our mode is God's mode, and that pouring or sprinkling properly administered is baptism, for God says it is; though Anabaptists are bold enough to assert that it is not.

But immersionists even attempt to make it appear that the baptism "with the Holy Ghost," on the day of Pentecost, was by immersion. They say the Holy Ghost filled the place, therefore all the people in the place were immersed in the Holy Ghost. The passage referred to is Acts ii. 2, and reads thus: "And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it (the sound not the Holy Ghost) filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost." Here are four particulars to which we call attention. 1. The sound filled the house where they were sitting. 2. The disciples were filled with the Holy Ghost. 3. The symbol sat upon each of them. 4. And all CAME FROM HEAVEN, fell upon, sat upon, was shed forth, filled them. Here was no plunging, nor anything like it. The sound came from above and filled the place; the spirit came from above and filled the dis- ciples; and the symbol came from above and sat upon each of them; so that the mode here, also, is just the reverse of that claimed by the immersionists: all came from above and fell upon them; they were not plunged into anything! And this is what God calls baptism. Defiant of all this, however, immersionists assert that pouring, sprinkling, falling, is no baptism. God says it is, they say it is not. God affirms, they deny. These are the facts in the case.

We will now group together those terms which God uses in reference to, and in connection with, baptism, and which, it will be seen, absolutely exclude the idea of plunging in the administration of that ordinance.

John i. 32: "And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him." Luke xxiv. 49: "And behold I send the promise of My Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high." When God baptized with the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, Peter said: "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel, And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh." See Acts ii. 16, 17. Also at verse 33 we read: "Therefore being at the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear." Acts x. 44: "While Peter yet spake these words the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word." Verse 45: "On the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost." Acts xi. 15: "The Holy Ghost fell on them, as on us at the beginning." Titus iii. 5, 6: "But according to His mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost; which He shed on us abundantly." Acts i. 5: "For John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost."

Now it is an indisputable fact that the baptism here spoken of was administered by descending, shedding, falling, pouring; not by plunging! And, observe, this baptism which was administered by pouring, is spoken of in connection with John's baptism: "For John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." To say that Christ plunged the people in the Holy Ghost would be utterly intolerable, if not blasphemous. And we have no authority to use different terms in each case; God does not; the terms which He uses to express John's administration are the very same that He uses to express his own. John baptized with water, He with the Holy Ghost. Therefore, as we know that God baptized by pouring, we have no right to assume that John or the apostles baptized by plunging, and no man living can prove that they did! And, observe, the terms here quoted refer both to the outward and the inward baptism; the outward and the inward sealing. The symbol, as well as the thing signified, fell upon them. But the advocates of plunging will have the party plunged in the symbol. The idea is alike absurd and unscriptural, and therefore could never proceed from God. It certainly is the offspring of ignorance and superstition. Moreover, there is nothing in religion, absolutely nothing, of which plunging is the symbol. But pouring is most strikingly symbolical. Hence, as a symbol of the baptism of the Holy Ghost, it has been practiced from time immemorial. Oil, it is well known, was poured upon the heads of high functionaries, as symbolical of the Spirit's descent upon them. But who ever thought of plunging them in the oil to signify that thing! The fact is, the more I investigate this subject, the more I become convinced that plunging for the purpose of administering Christian baptism is of human invention; I verily believe that God never appointed it, and I am sure no man can prove that he did; but a child can prove that he appointed pouring and sprinkling, just as soon as he is capable of reading God's book, for there the fact is written so plainly that he that runs may read. And, we may add, it is not likely that God would appoint both pouring and plunging as symbolical of one and the same thing, for they are entirely dissimilar.

CHAPTER III.

The idea that Christ's baptism and that of Christians are symbolical of Christ's burial, has no countenance from Scripture—It is absurd—Romans vi. 3, 4 fully examined and rescued from their perversions.

I am aware immersionists would have us believe that a plunge under water is an emblem of the burial of Christ's body. This idea they attempt to express in the following puerile lines :

“In Jordan's flood the prophet stands,
Immersing the returning Jews ;
The Son of God the rite demands,
Nor dare the Holy Man refuse ;
But plunges him beneath the wave,
An emblem of his future grave ;
Ye heavens, behold the Savior lie,
Beneath the flood from human eye.”

In Matt. xxvii. 60, we are told that “ Joseph took the body of Jesus and laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock.” And immersionists tell us that Johu plunged the living Savior in the river Jordan as an emblem of this transaction ; and they will have us all plunged under water for the same purpose ! Truly it requires a marvelous stretch of imagination to discover a resemblance between a dead body being "wrapped in a clean linen cloth" and laid in the cavity of a rock, and a living man walking into a river and being plunged under the water and lifted up again! They certainly must be hard up for a case of resemblance who seek it here; and that they seek it here is sufficient proof of the truth of the statement just made, viz.: that there is nothing in religion of which a sudden plunge under water is the type; for, if there was anything of which it is the most feeble type, they would never attempt to persuade us that it is an emblem of a dead body being laid in the cavity of a rock; for between these two transactions there is simply no resemblance at all. Moreover, we are nowhere taught in Scripture that the design of baptism is to symbolize Christ's body being laid in the tomb.

But immersionists think, or pretend to think, that Paul favors this view, Rom. vi. 3, 4. The whole passage reads thus: "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: That like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin."

Immersionists say, that, to be baptized is to be plunged, and that the word "means neither more nor less." Hence they would read this passage thus:

“Know ye not that so many of us as were plunged into Jesus Christ, were plunged into his death?” Such language is, of course, utterly intolerable; hence it is evident that to baptize does not mean to plunge; and it is equally evident that the apostle in this passage has no reference at all to the mode of baptism. Therefore, as immersionists build their argument upon this assumption, the foundation being taken away the argument becomes worthless, or rather is no argument at all. Of this difficulty they evidently are conscious, for although the apostle uses three figures in the same connection, immersionists never notice any but one of them, viz., that of burying; whereas the apostle speaks of our being buried, planted and crucified. Now why do they not insist upon a mode of baptism that will symbolize planting and crucifying as well as burying? for it is quite evident that the passage countenances all three as much as it does either one. The fact is, it is impossible to adopt a mode of baptism that will symbolize either; nor was it ever designed that we should. This is evident from the fact that the outward and visible sign in a sacrament is always symbolical of something spiritual; but if you make water baptism the sign of the crucifixion and burial of Christ, you make the literal to represent the literal, the symbol to symbolize the symbol, which is absurd! Yet this is the very thing that immersionists do by their unnatural and forced interpretation of this highly figurative passage. Christ’s dead body was laid in the cavity of a rock, and they say baptism by plunging is symbolical of that!

By this interpretation of the passage before us the design of the apostle is wholly lost sight of. The manifest design of the apostle is to show that justification by faith does not lead to licentiousness in the life of the believer.

Having established the doctrine of justification by faith he proceeds to meet the objection of its opponents thus: "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? God forbid: how shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein." So far from continuing in sin the believer is DEAD to sin. This is the apostle's answer to the objection. And this death to sin, or crucifixion of the old man, he represents as brought about by the death of Christ, and the baptism of the Holy Ghost, with faith on our part; of which faith, water baptism is the appropriate outward expression; and, at the same time, the seal of the righteousness thus procured, as well as the sign of the baptism by the Spirit. "Then," says Mr. Watson, (Institutes, vol. ii. p. 658), "he immediately runs into a favorite comparison, which, under various forms, occurs in his writings, sometimes accompanied with the same allusions to baptism, and sometimes referring only to faith as the instrument, a comparison between the mystical death, burial and resurrection of believers, and the literal death, burial and resurrection of Christ. This is the comparison of the text; not a comparison between our mystical death and baptism; nor between baptism and the death and burial of Christ; either of which lay wide of the apostle's intention." Any one who will read from the 6th to the 11th verse of this chapter will see that this is the comparison that the apostle employs for the purpose specified. "Knowing this," says the apostle, "that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is freed from sin. Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe we shall also live with him: Knowing that Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. For in that he died, he died unto sin once; but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

The sublime and glorious sentiments of the apostle here expressed are briefly these: the believer is "dead to sin" and is thus "freed from sin;" and his former unholy connection with the world is thus as effectually dissolved as is our literal connection with the world by a literal death. And the comparison is between this mystical death and separation, and Christ's death; by which his literal connection with the world was dissolved, and our death to sin and freedom from sin secured; and, in this way, our unholy connection with the world is as effectually dissolved, as was Christ's literal connection with the world, by his literal death. Now having compared our mystical death and separation from the world to Christ's literal death and separation from the world, he continues the train of thought and proceeds to compare our mystical resurrection to Christ's literal resurrection, thus: "That like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection. Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is freed from sin. Now if we be dead with Christ we believe that we shall also live with him. For in that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Now to represent the apostle in all these his sublime and inspired conceptions, illustrations and arguments, as simply attempting a comparison between plunging living men and women under water, and laying Christ's dead body in a tomb hewn out of a rock, is to degrade this noble and inspired production into driveling nonsense, and absolutely ignore the noble and glorious end or ends which he had in view, namely, to show the nature and extent of that change wrought in the sinner upon his believing in Jesus; together with the manner, or way, in which it is wrought, and thus refute the slanderous objection raised against the doctrine of justification by faith, viz., that it leads to a licentious life. And thus it is that error always leads from the truth and becomes a substitute for it; and in this case a very pernicious substitute!

CHAPTER IV.

The word Sprinkle is now taken up—Its use and design shown from Scripture—Plunging for the purpose of sealing is an outrage upon common sense.

Having rescued from the perversions of the Anabaptists the much abused words baptized, buried, we now take up the word sprinkle.

This word occurs with great frequency, and in the same connection, both in the Old and New Testament. We will here quote a few of the passages in which it occurs. Levit. xiv. 1, 2: "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, This shall be the law of the leper in the day of his cleansing."—"And he shall sprinkle upon him that is to be cleansed from the leprosy seven times," verse 4. At verses 15-18 we read, "And the priest shall take some of the log of oil and pour it into the palm of his own left hand; and the priest shall dip his right finger into the oil that is in his left hand, and shall sprinkle of the oil with his finger seven times before the Lord."—"And the remnant of the oil that is in the priest's hand he shall pour upon the head of him that is to be cleansed." Now the oil and blood here spoken of were used for the same purpose that water is used for in the sacrament of baptism, viz., as a sign; and a little in the palm of the hand, sprinkled with the tip of one finger, God considered quite sufficient: but Anabaptists think it quite ridiculous to use so small a quantity; instead of sprinkling the individual with the oil, blood or water, they would have him plunged in it! But we will quote a few more passages. Levit. xvi. 14, "And he shall take of the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it with his finger upon the mercy-seat." Numbers viii. 7, "And thus shalt thou do unto them to cleanse them: sprinkle water of purifying upon them!" Numbers xix. 18, "And a clean person shall take hyssop, and dip it in the water, and sprinkle it upon the tent, and upon all the vessels, and upon the persons that were there." Thus were they to do for an "unclean person;" and everybody knows, or should know, that baptism with water has reference to moral uncleanness, and to the same thing circumcision referred, and as neither blood nor water could cleanse the soul, but was applied to the body merely as a sign, a few drops sprinkled with the finger answered the purpose. The fact is, the idea of virtue is attached to the outward application by all those who object to small, and contend for large, quantities of water; and in this way the ordinance is perverted and vitiated, and the inward application, which is the thing signified, and which alone possesses the cleansing power, is wholly lost sight of: and this, in our judgment, is a serious objection to the practice of plunging instead of sprinkling or pouring. But there really is no excuse for thus losing the spirit in the letter, for God has made the design of the outward application sufficiently plain, as the following quotations will show: Isaiah lii. 15, "So shall he (Jesus) sprinkle many nations." Ezekiel xxxvi. 25-27, "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you: and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh, and I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them." Heb. ix. 19, "For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book and all the people." Heb. x. 22, "Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience." Heb. xii. 24, "We are come to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel."

Thus all these sprinklings end in that which they typify, namely, the sprinkling, the cleansing of the soul by the blood of Jesus: and a few drops answered this purpose as well as a river, or a sea, and much better; but man, poor, ignorant, carnal man, must improve upon God's way of it; instead of having the sign or seal applied to the person, he, forsooth, must have the person plunged in it: the idea is unnatural and absurd in the extreme! Baptism is a sign and seal, as circumcision was; and of course the seal should be applied to the party to be sealed, not the party to the seal! It is thus that God uses the seal, as the foregoing Scriptures do most incontestably show. And the following text affords still more striking evidence, if that be possible. "After that ye believed ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise."—Ep. i. 13. It is obvious that the apostle here speaks of the same baptism, the same sealing, which was the subject of promise in the texts quoted above. "I will pour out my spirit upon you." "Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." It is to this promise that the apostle refers when he says: "After that ye believed ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise." The symbol fell upon the body, the Spirit upon the soul.

So it is in the administration of the sacrament of baptism; the symbol, the seal, which is water, falls upon and seals the body, the Spirit falls upon and seals the soul. This, then, is another ground of objection to plunging. God's method, or mode, of baptizing, includes, and very strikingly expresses, the idea of sealing, while plunging utterly excludes that idea; the idea of plunging for the purpose of sealing is an outrage on common sense.

CHAPTER V.

The assumption that en, eis, and ek, always mean in, into, and out of, is refuted, and the argument built thereon, shown to be worthless, a mere begging of the question.

We now take up the argument which immersionists ground upon the assumption that the Greek prepositions en, eis, and ek, always mean in, into, and out of. On this assumption it is confidently asserted that John baptized in Jordan, that Jesus came up out of the water, and that Philip and the Eunuch went down into the water, and came up out of the water, and finally, that they must all have been plunged under the water! Hence this famous argument is made up of three assumptions; viz., that these words mean what immersionists say they mean, neither more nor less; second, that all the parties mentioned went into the water and were baptized in it; third, that, therefore, they must all have been plunged under the water. Now in all this there is absolutely nothing but assumption, which assumption we now proceed to disprove.

We will first take up the preposition en. Now, observe, we do not deny that the Greek word en sometimes means in; but we do deny that it always has this meaning. Mr. Thorne says "from an accurate investigation of the subject," he finds that, "in our version of the New Testament, the translators have rendered en, at, on, or with, three hundred and thirteen times. But lest the immersionist should say that our translators should have rendered en, in, in all these places, we will quote a few passages, which will, we think, demonstrate that it would be highly improper, in many instances, to render en, in. And here I beg to state that I have examined the original for myself, and am prepared to say that it reads as I here state. Matt. iii. 11. "I indeed baptize you en water eis repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you en the Holy Ghost and fire." Now let en, and eis, in this passage be rendered in, and into, and then the passage will read thus, "I indeed baptize you in water into repentance:"—"but he shall baptize you in the Holy Ghost and fire." And if we render baptize, plunge, in this text, as immersionists say we should, the case will be still worse: then the text will read, "I indeed plunge you in water into repentance:"—"but he shall plunge you in the Holy Ghost and fire." Now in addition to the absurdity, not to say blasphemy, of this rendering, it leaves us without any baptism at all, either literal or spiritual; nothing but plunging in water into repentance and in the Holy Ghost! By this exhibit any one can see the absurdity and the untruthfulness of the assumption here opposed. Take another instance. In Romans viii. 34, we read, "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God."

The word here rendered at is, in the original, in one of my Greek Testaments en, in the other eis. Now, according to the assumption here opposed, this text would read, in the one, "who is even in the right hand of God," and in the other, "who is even into the right hand of God!" This presents the absurdity and untruthfulness of the assumption with similar clearness. We have examined many other texts where this preposition means at, by, near to. See, for instance, Luke xiii. 4, where our Lord speaks of "the Tower en Siloam." Certainly the tower was not in the pool, or well, but at or near it. In one of my Greek Testaments the words are, "Ho purgos eis to Siloam;" "the tower into Siloam," according to the assumption here opposed! In Matt. ix. 35, we are told Christ "healed every sickness, and every disease among the people." The word here rendered among, is in the original en, and in one of my Greek Testaments eis, hence according to the claims of immersionists this text should read, "every sickness and every disease in, or into, the people!" Let these few out of many texts suffice to show the untruthfulness and the absurdity of the assumption here objected to, and we think, now fully refuted.

The preposition eis may now come under notice. The arguments in favor of immersion are based on the assumption that this word always means into. In Matt. xxi. 1, we read, "And when they drew nigh unto Jerusalem, and were come to Bethpage, unto the Mount of Olives." Here eis is rendered nigh, with regard to the one place, and to with regard to the other, for it is evident Jesus and his companions could not enter both places at the same time, they being distant from each other. In Matt. xvii. 27, Peter is commanded to go eis the sea, and cast an hook." It is evident that Peter is not here commanded to go into the sea to cast in thither his hook; to cast a hook into the sea at Capernaum it was not necessary that he should go into the sea, probably not practicable; hence our translators have rendered eis, to, not into, and they had as much authority so to translate in the narrative of John's baptism, and that of Philip: and immersionists have no more right to place John in Jordan, and Philip and the Eunuch in the water, than they have to place Peter in the sea at Capernaum.

Acts xxiv. 15. "And have hope toward God," not into God. Matt. xviii. 15. "If thy brother shall trespass against thee," here eis is rendered against, for it would not be proper to say trespassed into thee, any more than it would have been proper to say in the former text, hope into God. Mark iii. 29. "But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost." Here again eis is rendered against, for it certainly would not be proper to say "blaspheme into the Holy Ghost." Acts xxii. 30. "Brought Paul and set him before them." Here eis is rendered before, for it would not be proper to say, set him into them. In Isaiah xxxvi. 2, we read, "And the King of Assyria sent Rabshakeh from Lachish to Jerusalem." In the Septuagint the reading is ek Lachish eis Jerusalem. Here it is evident that ek and eis mean from and to, not out of, and into, for Rabshakeh was not sent into Jerusalem. And we have the same authority to translate to the water, and from the water, in the narrative of the Eunuch's baptism by Philip. In short, every scholar knows that both sacred and classic writers use ek, and eis, to express the ideas from, and to. Apo and eis are also used in the same connection: hence we read, apo city eis city. That is, from city to city. Apo Jerusalem, eis Jericho. Also, the way that goeth down, apo Jerusalem, eis Gaza. That is, "the way that goeth down from Jerusalem to Gaza."

With regard to ek, or ex, we will simply quote a few texts to show the various meanings of that preposition. Matt. xii. 33. "The tree is known by its fruit." Here ek is rendered by. Matt. xx. 2. "Agreed with the laborers ek denariou;" that is, for a penny. In Matt. xxi. 19, it is rendered on; in Rom ix. 21, it is rendered of. In short, Mr. Thorne, who has been at the trouble of counting, tells us that in the New Testament ek is rendered from 186 times, and eis to, or unto, 538 times. And in Schleusner's Lexicon of the New Testament, we are told that ek has 24 distinct meanings, or senses, en 36, and eis 26. And yet the advocates of plunging, as the only mode of baptism, build their arguments upon the assumption that en, eis, and ek, always mean in, into and out of. It is true, they admit, at least those of them who are scholars, that these words have a great variety of meanings; but it is equally true that the arguments which they deduce from the narratives of John's and Philip's baptism are all based upon this assumption. Indeed they admit that the word baptizo has a great variety of meanings, yet, strange as it may appear, their arguments in favor of plunging are, for the most part, built upon the assumption that it always means "to immerse, to dip, to plunge, neither more nor less." But that this assumption is without warrant or plausibility we believe we have clearly shown. Nor will the connection in which the word baptizo is found in the Scriptures give any countenance to this assumption; for it is found connected with the words fall, pour, shed, sprinkle, and other words of similar import. And with regard to the prepositions with which it sometimes stands connected, we trust we have shown that they give no warrant for the assumption: therefore the assumption is utterly without foundation! And, let it be distinctly observed, that, at the very most, there can be no more than assumption; for no man in his senses can claim that we are any where in the Scriptures commanded to plunge in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost! The utmost that can be claimed even with the slightest plausibility, by the advocates of plunging, is that the verb baptizo sometimes means to plunge; but even if we admit this claim, our admission will not affect our position, for still it will remain a fact that sprinkling or pouring is baptism, for God says it is, and in that way he always administers baptism: nor would our admission afford the advocates of plunging any help till they first prove that the word has that meaning in Scripture where Christian baptism is recorded and enjoined; and this we know they cannot do, while we can prove, and have proved, that it means to sprinkle, to pour, and that this is God's mode, INVARIABLY SO.

Once again I say, and I say it with all confidence, that no man living can prove that God ever taught plunging for baptism; hence those who undertake to administer baptism in that way do it upon their own authority. And everybody knows, or may know, that God never baptized by plunging! Here are the facts: God's precept is pouring; His practice is pouring; while in favor of plunging there is absolutely not one jot or tittle! Let them disprove this conclusion who can.

CHAPTER VI.

A fallacy and its terrible consequences exposed—If Philip and the Eunuch did go down into the water it would not follow that either was plunged—The question, “why did John baptize where there was much water?” answered.

Just here it may be well to expose the fallacy, and show the terrible consequences, of taking that which is occasionally the meaning of a given word, and assuming that such is its primary, its only meaning.

The primary meaning of the Greek word doulos, is poor, exhausted, reduced to poverty. Hence this word was used to designate a servant, and finally a slave. Now take the latter as the primary, the only meaning of the word doulos, and you may prove that all who are employed by their fellow-men are slaves, yea, and that all the people of God are slaves! It is in this way that slaveholders, and the advocates of slavery, have attempted to prove that slavery is of divine appointment, is scriptural, because in the Scriptures certain directions are given to regulate the mutual relations and obligations of kurioi and douloi; that is, masters and servants. Again the primary meaning of the word pistis, is faith, but it sometimes means fidelity. Now assume that the latter is its only meaning and you may prove that salvation is not by believing, but by fidelity, and in this way you would overturn the whole Christian system! Again the primary meaning of the Greek word pneuma, like the Hebrew word ruach, is spirit, but it sometimes means wind, air. Now only assume that the latter is its only meaning and you may prove from the Bible that God is the wind, for our blessed Lord says Pneuma ho Theos, that is, according to this assumption, God is the wind! In the same way you may prove that man's higher nature is mere wind or air! Again psuche means the immortal part of man as distinguished from the body; but it sometimes means the breath, and even the blood, because these are the essentials of animal life, and the primary meaning of psuche being life, it is applied thereto in a secondary sense; but its primary application is to the immortal part, that being life in the highest sense. Now if you take the accommodated meaning of this word and assume that to be its only meaning, you will reach the conclusion of the Adventists, or Nasoulites, viz., that man has no soul, no spirit, that there is nothing of him but mere matter. Again deipnon means a supper, a common meal, a feast; assume this to be the only meaning of the word and like the Corinthians you will reduce "the Lord's Supper" to a common meal, a feast. Once more. The Hebrew word Sheol and the Greek word Hades mean the hidden, the concealed, the lowest place, or condition; hence it is applied to the grave. Now let it be assumed that the latter is the only meaning of the word, and you will reach the conclusion, with the Universalist, that there is no hell, no punishment or place of punishment, in the other world.

Now, this is precisely the fallacy which, to the ignorant, gives plausibility to what immersionists say in favor of their mode of baptizing. They say en means in, eis means into, and ek means out of, and so they do; but, assuming that these are the only meanings of these words, and finding them used sometimes, though not always, in the narrative of John's baptism, and that by Philip, they say they went down into the water and came up out of it, ergo, they baptized by plunging! Now, in precisely the same way others conclude that man is a mere animal, and that there is no future punishment. Such is the nature of this fallacy, and such are the terrible consequences to which it leads, or may lead, the ignorant and unsuspecting.

Having shown that the Greek prepositions en, eis, and ek, are employed both by the sacred and classic writers to express the ideas near, to, and from, and many others, as well as in, into, and out of, we have disproved the assumption of the immersionists, viz., that they always mean in, into, and out of; and as many of their arguments in favor of plunging rest upon this assumption, it follows that such arguments are worthless: hence all their conclusions in favor of immersion, so far as they depend upon the statements that John baptized in Jordan, and that Philip and the Eunuch went down into the water and came up out of it, are illegitimate and worthless; therefore, if they would prove plunging to be the right mode, they must derive their proof from a very different source, for every scholar knows that the Greek prepositions afford no such proof.

But even though they could prove that Philip and the Eunuch went down into the water, that would not prove that the latter was plunged under the water, for if Philip baptized the Eunuch by sprinkling, they would both have to go to or into the water to this end, for it is not likely that they had a vessel with them to carry water to a distance, and it is still less likely that the water would come up to them in the chariot. Moreover, if the text proves that the Eunuch was immersed, it also proves that Philip was immersed; for there is nothing said of the one, with regard to going down and coming up, that is not said of the other. In short, the language employed to record this event, is just such as any one would employ where immersion was not so much as thought of. It should be observed, too, that if the Eunuch was immersed, he must have been immersed naked, or with his clothes on, for it is not likely that he had a change of garments with him, nor is it at all likely that he would pursue his long journey in the garments in which he was plunged in the water, and he did pursue his journey immediately after being baptized, for we are told, "when they were come up out of," or from "the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, that the Eunuch saw him no more, and he went on his way rejoicing." I should think he would feel more like trembling than rejoicing, if he was sitting in the chariot in the same clothes in which he had just before been plunged under water; and there certainly is no intimation of his having undressed and dressed again. In short, there is nothing in this narrative that would lead any one to the belief that Philip plunged the Eunuch under water, especially when it is remembered that the Divinely instituted method of pouring and sprinkling had existed among Philip's ancestors for nearly two thousand years! Indeed, the prophecy which Philip was explaining to the Eunuch, and which led to the conversion and baptism of the latter, contains these remarkable words: "So shall he sprinkle many nations." See last verse of chapter lii. of Isaiah. Being now a believer in Him who should "sprinkle many nations," the Eunuch at once desired to be baptized, agreeably to the prophetic promise now before him, and which Philip was explaining to him. Now, as sprinkling, not plunging, was specified in the passage before them, and as that mode had been practiced by the Jews from the first until now, and that by divine appointment, it is not likely that either Philip or the Eunuch would think of plunging on this occasion. The Eunuch said: "I pray thee, of whom speaketh the prophet this?" Philip told him that it was Jesus of whom the prophet spake, and the Eunuch believed. The prophet said that this Jesus would "sprinkle many nations;" and the Eunuch said: "See, here is water, what doth hinder me to be baptized?" There was nothing to hinder him—he was baptized by sprinkling, doubtless, agreeably to the Scripture upon which they had just now been meditating.

It is only necessary to add, that all we have said with regard to the baptism by Philip, will apply to John's baptism, and is a sufficient answer to the arguments which the advocates of immersion employ to prove that John plunged the people under water; for their arguments in each case are derived from the same assumption, viz.: that eis, en and ek mean into, in, and out of. Indeed it is not said in the original that Jesus came up out of the water. In Matt. iii. 16, the original reads: anebē euthus apo tou hudatos, up straight FROM the water. Therefore, with regard to John's baptism it only remains for us to answer the question, "If John did not immerse why did he baptize where there was much water?" We reply, if your mind were not unduly occupied with the dogma of immersion you would find a satisfactory answer to your question in the sacred narrative. Just read the following: "And he came into all the country about Jordan preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." Here follow specimens of his preaching and of his exhortations. Luke iii. 3. "Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan." Matt. iii. 5. "John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." Observe, it is not only said that he "baptized in Jordan," but also that he "baptized in the wilderness." Hence, I have as good a right to infer from these texts that John plunged in the wilderness as others have to infer that he plunged in Jordan, the same preposition being used in each case. In one of my Greek Testaments the words are eis ten erēmōn, in the other en te erēmō.

But my special object in quoting these texts is to call attention to the vast multitudes which came to John from Jerusalem and the different regions here specified, certainly not less than several millions, with their camels, &c., to abide there for a length of time to be instructed by the great preacher who was the forerunner of their long expected Messiah, and who was now preparing them for his immediate appearing. It is quite evident that such vast multitudes under such circumstances, required much water for domestic and other purposes. In short, no man in his senses would bring such multitudes of human beings and beasts of burden from a distance to abide for a time where there was not much water; especially in a hot season, and in a country where water generally was scarce. Moreover, if he was to preach to and baptize the people dwelling in "all the region round about Jordan," it was obviously proper that he should have his station at Jordan, that being a central position. For similar reasons he had his station at another time at Enon, where there was a suitable supply of water; though there does not appear to have been the vast quantities that immersionists would have us believe there was; for travelers find no evidence of there being in Enon any more than certain fountains or springs. It is well known that camp-meetings in this country are always held where there is plenty of water, though I suppose a thousand such congregations would not be equal to the vast multitudes who came to hear this great preacher in the wilderness, and to be baptized of him. From these considerations it is evident that John needed much water for the millions to whom he preached in the wilderness, without supposing that he plunged them all into it! The idea is as gratuitous as it is extravagant. How is it that we never hear of the apostles baptizing where much water was? Evidently because they labored where the people were, at or near their homes, and, therefore, had all the necessities of domestic life; and, there being no plunging, that was sufficient.

CHAPTER VII.

The dogma that nothing but Plunging is Baptism is shown to involve what is Unreasonable, Inhuman and even Impossible.

We must not pass unnoticed the unreasonableness of the assumptions here objected to. For instance, is it reasonable to suppose that one man plunged millions of people in a river, "in the wilderness," where neither himself nor the millions thus plunged had any home or any of the conveniences of domestic life? Is it reasonable to suppose that all these vast multitudes had changes of raiment or gowns for the purpose? or that they were plunged into the river having on them the only suit of clothes they had? or that the countless multitudes should live in the wilderness with their wet garments on till they dried upon their persons? or is it reasonable to suppose that these vast multitudes were exposed and plunged into the river naked? Is it reasonable to suppose that John himself was naked, or that he lived and labored in his wet clothes, or had a sufficient number of changes of raiment of "camel's hair?" Is it reasonable to suppose that any man could live in the wilderness, or rather in the river, and plunge under water such vast multitudes of people from Jerusalem, from Judea, and from "all the region round about Jordan?" When a man baptizes a few in a river in these days he is glad to hasten to his comfortable home and change as quickly as possible; and the poor trembling female must be carried home in a carriage, or to the nearest house, and stripped as quickly as possible; or if there are a dozen or twenty to be baptized, it will require several Sabbaths to do this little work, because a sufficient number of gowns cannot be procured! I wonder how long it would have taken John to baptize several millions in this way! Is it reasonable to suppose that a few apostles plunged three thousand men and women on the day of Pentecost, not in Jordan nor in Enon, where much water was, but in Jerusalem, where little water was, and all this in a few hours at most; for most of the day was evidently occupied by preaching and other religious exercises? Is it reasonable to suppose that God has made plunging so essential that there can be no baptism, no admission to the sacrament of the Supper, no admission into the Christian Church, yea, no Church at all, without it; although there are countries where water cannot be had unless in very small quantities, by melting the snow, for large bodies of water are covered over with ice fifteen or twenty feet thick, while multitudes of others live in dry and parched deserts "where no water is?" Is it reasonable to suppose that an infinitely wise, kind and merciful God would exclude from the sacrament of baptism, from the sacrament of the supper, and from the Church itself, millions of the feeble, the sick and the wounded, simply because they are in a state that renders it imprudent, yea, wicked and even impossible, to plunge them under water, when his own instituted method may be adopted without risk to the feeblest of them? For instance, thousands of our wounded, sick and mangled soldiers, are obtaining salvation by faith in our adorable Jesus. Must they be deprived of the sacraments, of the seal of the covenant of grace, and shut out from the Church of God, simply because their poor, mangled and sick bodies cannot be plunged under water? I ask, is all this scriptural? Is it reasonable? Is it humane? Is it not rather cruel and absurd? Yet all this is implied, is included, in the claims of the immersionists!

CHAPTER VIII.

The appeal to antiquity is simply superstition, cruelty and absurdity, appealing to superstition, cruelty and absurdity—Many superstitions and absurd opinions and practices specified as having obtained in the nominally Christian Church at a very early period—It is difficult to mention any one religious dogma that is more clogged with difficulties than is the dogma of plunging.

But, to support these unscriptural, unreasonable, inhuman and cruel claims, immersionists appeal to antiquity. This is none other than superstition, cruelty and absurdity, appealing to superstition, cruelty and absurdity for help ! What absurdity is there that may not claim kindred with antiquity ? Not being satisfied with the simplicity of the divine institutions, men soon began to add to them to make them more impressive. And this work commenced even before the apostles were called away. But as early as the latter end of the second, or the beginning of the third century, the practice of washing before pouring was adopted ; then partially immersing, followed by pouring ; then immersing three times, anointing with oil, signing with the sign of the cross ; imposition of hands, exorcism, eating milk and honey, putting on white robes, and other superstitious observances worthy of the dark ages. As early as the third century, some, in receiving the sacrament of the supper, mixed water with the wine; others used water only, while others used bread and cheese. The Ophites had a tamed serpent which they caused to twine round the bread—then they kissed the serpent, and afterwards partook of the bread. The Zanzalians contended that the Scriptural baptism was a baptism with fire; and their mode was to brand three times with a red-hot iron. The Jovinians taught that grace received in baptism could never be lost. The Hieraxites taught that all infants would be damned, for they held that the procuring cause of salvation was knowledge, and this of course left no chance for the poor infant. The Novations taught many absurdities, and being confident that they only were right, they of course re-baptized all who joined them and who had been baptized before. The Valentinians baptized in the name of the Father, his Son, and the mother of the world! And as to the Donatists, they taught that baptism administered by any but their own party was invalid, and that they had authority to remove all errors and corruptions from the Church! Now all these and numerous other errors and absurdities, and even blasphemies, were taught in the second, third and fourth centuries. Nor were these errors confined to the vile sects such as those noticed above, but what was called the orthodox Church soon became deluged with pernicious errors and superstitious rights and ceremonies; and many of the leading ministers, such as Tertullian, Origen and Augustine, largely contributed thereto! Such men were zealous and swayed the masses with their eloquence, but they were miserable theologians. And why? I answer, because they relied upon their own ability and upon human philosophy to learn and teach what only can be learned and taught from the word of God. Moreover, many of them still clung to errors which they had contracted before they embraced Christianity. Such was the case, for instance, with Augustine, who had been a Manichean before he embraced Christianity. And such was the case with many others who still retained some of their former errors, and embraced others; all of which they attempted to incorporate with the Christian system. But it is useless to dwell upon this feature of antiquity. It is well known that the nominally Christian Church became corrupt at a very early period. "The ancient Christians," says Wall, "when they were baptized by immersion, were all baptized naked, whether they were men, women or children. They thought it better represented the putting off of the old man, and also the nakedness of Christ on the cross: moreover, as baptism is a washing, they judged it should be the washing of the body, not of the clothes." "There is no ancient historical fact," says Robinson, "better authenticated than this." Now when immersionists appeal to antiquity in favor of immersion, why don't they faithfully follow antiquity and baptize men, women and children NAKED? But so far are they from following antiquity that they do not baptize them at all, either naked or clothed; and yet they boast of following antiquity, and loudly complain that we do not copy after their example! Well, while we regret that they follow antiquity in some things, let us be thankful that they do not in others, for we certainly do not wish them to follow antiquity as to the naked mode! We, however, think it would be much wiser for them to follow the Bible and let antiquity go, or only follow it as far as it followed Christ!

Now if immersionists infer the practice of John the Baptist, and that of the apostles, from the practice of the Christians of the third and fourth centuries, they must of course reach the conclusion that John and the apostles baptized men, women and children naked. And if so, a marvelous scene must have been presented at Jordan and Enon in the days of John; and a still more marvelous scene must have been presented in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. We leave it to your imagination to depict the scene! The following quotation from Wall, however, will somewhat relieve the difficulty: "They, however, took great care for preserving the modesty of any woman who was to be baptized. None but women came near till her body was in the water; then the priest came, and putting her head also under water, he departed and left her to the women." If this was the method on the day of Pentecost, when three thousand persons were baptized, the good sisters in Jerusalem must have had a busy time of it; for we may safely presume that sixteen or eighteen hundred of them were females, for in a revival there are usually more females than males converted. Before this day there were only a very few Christian women in Jerusalem, and we may presume that they were the only women that would attend to this work; and these few women, according to this showing, must have immersed the bodies of some sixteen hundred women, while the apostles only popped their heads under the water, and then left them to the women who put them in, to take them out again and dress them. There was no body of water in Jerusalem in which three thousand could be immersed, neither could they be immersed in one, or even in fifty baths, in a few hours; therefore, if they were immersed at all, it must have been in very many baths, in different and distant parts of the city; then the question arises, how could a few apostles run all over the city, from bath to bath, to immerse three thousand in a few hours? for "they were added to the Church the same day." Moreover, most of these baths or cisterns were in the hands of Jews, who were the deadly enemies of the Christians, and would not be likely to let the Christians have their baths. But a still greater difficulty presents itself just here. How could the few Christian females who were then in the city run from bath to bath, all over the city, and put, say sixteen hundred females into them, and take them out again and dress them, after the apostles had put their heads under? How could they do all this in a few hours? Now it is evident that the advocates of immersion must account for these or for still greater difficulties. It should be observed, too, that the women baptized the bodies of the women, while the apostles, on this hypothesis, only baptized their heads! Here, too, another question arises, viz., which part of the performance was most orthodox, that of the women or that of the apostles? One might say of them as Socrates said of living and dying, "which is best the gods know," for I suppose even immersionists themselves cannot tell. And, by the way, there is a similar difficulty connected with modern immersion; for the priest only plunges about one-half of the body, while the individual immerses the other half by walking into the water, so that there is only partial immersion by the priest after all; and still the question remains to be decided, which part of the body received Scripture baptism? Or did either? The advocates of plunging will please answer!

It is really difficult to mention any one religious dogma that is more clogged with difficulties and absurdities than is this dogma of exclusive immersion; nor does it stop with difficulties and absurdities, for, as we have seen, it includes positive impossibilities!

CHAPTER IX.

Summing up—A great variety of Particulars are specified—Plunging was, and is, connected with Superstition and various Errors, and is doubtless the Offspring of Superstition—Proselyting, causing Proselytes to Renounce their Baptism is very Serious—Unreasonableness of the Supposition that the German Fanatics discovered what all the wise and the learned, both ancient and modern, have failed to discover. It is the duty of Zion's Watchmen to save their People from being Proselyted—The sincerity of the Anabaptists in crying for Union under certain circumstances is very questionable while they teach as they do—We are not at liberty to reject a divinely appointed Method and adopt another, especially when that other is very objectionable in itself—Nor is the Church at Liberty to leave to the Choice and Whims of men to decide whether it is her Duty to teach what God has already decided—Taylor's Pictorial Representations showing the Ancient mode of Baptism.

And now, having said this much, we may sum up the evidence and rest our cause. The amount is briefly this: God's mode of baptizing is by pouring, shedding, sprinkling. In a word, by the baptismal element falling upon the party baptized, invariably so, this, with all who believe the word of God, is an indisputable fact. Second, In the word of God that is called baptism where water fell upon the Israelites, and upon Nebuchadnezzar, by sprinkling or by pouring; this, too, is a fact! Third, There is not in all

God's word so much as one clear text in favor of plunging as being the divinely appointed mode of baptism; this, too, is a fact! Fourth, God has appointed sprinkling or pouring, as the appropriate sign of baptism by the Spirit, and as the appropriate sign of cleansing by the blood of Jesus; this, also, is a fact! To these facts we may add a fact mentioned by Richard Watson, together with the inference that he draws from it: "The superstition of antiquity appears to have gone most in favor of baptism by immersion; this is a circumstance which affords a strong presumption that it was one of those additions to the ancient rite which superstition originated." To this judicious remark may be added the fact that superstitious and grossly erroneous sects still go most in favor of plunging. As instances, it is only necessary to refer to the Mormons, Campbellites and others, who, as is usual with the advocates of plunging, seem to make plunging the one thing needful. And, by the way, this fact itself affords strong reason to suspect that plunging is of superstitious origin, for it has always been the characteristic of the superstitious and grossly erroneous to make their own inventions of more importance than the teachings of God's word. The prominence which Baptists, so called, give to their peculiar dogma is well known. They are proverbial for their proselyting proclivities. And the inducement which they invariably hold out to those whom they would proselyte from other churches is, that they will plunge them, or, as they prefer to express it, immerse them, taking care to assure them that short of this there is no baptism, and, consequently, no admission to the Christian Church, no right to the Sacrament of the Supper, and, in short, that they must remain, if not immersed, "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world." I have often wondered why there was such a remarkable uniformity among Baptists with regard to these two things, viz.: laying great stress upon being plunged, and making mighty efforts to proselyte from other Churches; but I now see that the reason is obviously this, viz.: Most of those who join that church are led to do so by the teaching here specified, and, consequently, believe that plunging, and plunging only, is baptism; and for this reason they recognize all others, all who have not been plunged, as being excluded from the commonwealth of Israel, as stated above. And now being in the Church, and constantly under the same teaching, the original impression becomes more and more deep, and they, of course, become more and more bigoted and exclusive, and, looking upon all outside of their Church as being in the deplorable condition of unbaptized heathen, they soon become zealously engaged in the work of proselyting, and to obtain proselytes they hold out the same inducements that had been held out to themselves, and that had proved successful. Hence it is that Anabaptists are so unanimous in this particular, especially in connection with a revival which may be progressing in a given locality; then immersion is their alpha and their omega; and consequently, those who join them do so, in most instances, on this single consideration. Thus it is that plunging and proselyting go together! This attempt to account for the proselyting proclivities of the Anabaptists, and for their zeal and unanimity in this regard, is really the best apology we can make for them; for if they believe that those whom they proselyte, or attempt to proselyte, from other churches, are really in the covenant of grace and in the fold of Christ, their proselyting practices deserve much severe censure.

But however we may apologize for the proselyting practices of the Anabaptists, it must still appear to be a very serious matter when it is remembered that they cause all whom they proselyte from other churches, to renounce their previous baptism as being no baptism, and, consequently, to recognize and declare their plunging to be the only baptism! Now it is not possible, on calm reflection, to view this as being a matter of little or no importance. Just look at it again. Here are those who say that God, for Christ's sake, has pardoned their sins, that He has given them the spirit of adoption whereby we cry, "Abba, Father." That spirit now bears witness with their spirits that they are the children of God; they were baptized, say by their spiritual father, who has grown old and gray-headed in the service of his Master, and whose labors, by the Divine blessing, have been instrumental in the salvation of multitudes; and by Him these persons have been received to the communion of saints, amongst whom they have lived, we may suppose, for several years, rejoicing in hope of the glory of God; and being fed with the bread of life by that same spiritual Father, and being helped on their way by those with whom they first united, they are still going on their way rejoicing. Now let us suppose that one of these Anabaptists comes along and artfully persuades some of these, perhaps inexperienced and unsuspecting, that they never received Christian baptism, that they must follow Christ down into the water, that they must be buried with Him in baptism, that Philip and the Eunuch went down into the water and came up out of the water. And after mixing up all these terms so as to convey the idea that they all mean immersion, for he will not use the word plunge, though he means it, he sums up by assuring those unsuspecting and inexperienced ones that sprinkling is a modern invention, an invention of popery, that immersion was the only mode practiced for more than fifteen hundred years! Finally, in short, he persuades them to renounce their former baptism, as not being Christian baptism, and leads them down to the river and plunges them under the water. The work is now complete; with their former baptism they have been persuaded to renounce their former Church as not being a Christian Church, and those hitherto recognized and loved as Christian brethren and sisters are recognized and loved as such no longer; they will no longer with them surround the Lord's table, as they had been wont to do, nor will they allow them to come and surround the table that is spread in their new home; nor will they sit at the Sacramental table with the venerable man whom they long loved as their spiritual father, or if they would, those who have proselyted them will not allow them, nor will they allow him to come and partake with them; already there is fixed between them a great gulf! These are facts, and with such facts I could fill many pages, and it was the repetition of such facts, of late, that led me to preach and write as I have now done. I say the repetition, for with such doings as these I have often been pained and grieved for many years; and I am sure that my experience in this particular is not much different from that of other ministers who have labored where the Anabaptists had a Church. It was thus that their fathers commenced their operations in the days of Martin Luther, as we shall by and by show, and their children but too faithfully copy after their example.

Now, whether we believe that the baptism thus renounced was, or was not, Christian baptism, the case is a very serious one. If it was not, then all ministers except those of the Anabaptist persuasion, are leading the people astray, and both themselves and their people are unbaptized, as were the countless millions of ministers and members who have lived and died in other than the Anabaptist denomination in past ages; and all this notwithstanding the great learning, great knowledge, thorough investigations, marvelous researches, deep piety and unquestioned holiness of multitudes of them; yes, notwithstanding all this, we must conclude, if these proselyting Anabaptists be correct, that they all died ignorant and destitute of Christian baptism! And it was reserved for such men as the ignorant and fanatical John Mathias, a baker of Haerlem, and John Boccold, a journeyman tailor of Leyden, in Germany, to obtain a knowledge of Christian baptism, while the learned and studious Melancthon, and the great reformer, Luther, were left to live and die alike ignorant and destitute of it! But if all this be too monstrous to be believed, then we are forced to the startling conclusion that these proselyting re-baptizers renounce Christian baptism, declaring it to be no baptism, and lead others, especially the inexperienced and unsuspecting youth who have recently been both converted and baptized, to do the same, simply because they were baptized by sprinkling or pouring; and this is done in defiance of the facts, the indisputable facts, that God instituted sprinkling and pouring, and that he calls sprinkling and pouring baptism, and that he himself has invariably baptized by pouring, never by plunging; and, finally, that no man living can refer us to a single text of Scripture to show that God ever appointed or practiced plunging.

We have already specified the chapters and verses where all these facts, except the last, are asserted by some of the plainest and most unmistakable utterances that have ever reached us from the lips of the Most High! And the last is the fact that he has not appointed or practiced plunging as the mode of baptism, at least that no man can show us where He has done so. If any can refer us to the chapter and verse, let them do so, and if they do we will give up this fact, but even then all the other facts will remain! It is evident, then, that the practice of the re-baptizers is serious, awfully serious. God pardons, regenerates, adopts and baptizes precious souls, and they pronounce that baptism no baptism, and cause the parties thus baptized to do the same thing. God seals his children with the seal of the Christian covenant, and they efface or attempt to efface that seal and pronounce it no seal. And for that baptism they substitute plunging, and for that plunging, as the mode of baptism, they cannot produce one clear text from God's word, while, at the same time, it is a positive fact, if the Bible be true, that God both teaches and practices baptism by sprinkling and pouring. I say this is serious, awfully serious. And I give it as my solemn conviction that when these re-baptizers approach any church to pronounce its members unbaptized and to persuade them to renounce their baptism, leave their church, be plunged and join the church of the re-baptizers, they should be rebuked and repelled with all diligence and by the use of every proper means. I believe it is the bounden duty of God's watchmen to do so, and they are recreant to their trust if they permit the re-baptizers or, any others, to come in and unsettle, pervert and lead away their young converts and others who, in consequence of inexperience and limited knowledge in some things, are liable to be led astray by designing men, whose object is to build up their own organization, and thus, as Paul expresses it, "make a gain of them;" or, as Jude expresses it, "having men's persons in admiration because of advantage." This, we are confident, is the object of many of these proselyting teachers, while many of their members, it is hoped, are simply guided by a mistaken zeal. But whatever may be the motives of these proselyters, it is unquestionably the duty of the Christian shepherd to watch over the flock committed to his care, and not allow these proselyters to steal away his sheep. If, however, the Anabaptists honestly believe that there is no baptism, no entrance to the Christian Church but by plunging, and no Church but that which is composed of those who have been baptized by plunging, let them go out into the world and convert sinners, and then let them plunge, dip or immerse them; any way so that they bring them to heaven; but let them not undertake to pervert and steal the members of other churches by telling them that such churches are not Christian churches, and that their baptism is not Christian baptism—let them not do this. Neither let them, as they often do, especially at a time of revival, cry out for a union with us while they thus believe and teach concerning us. We really believe that union is an impossibility while they thus believe and teach, nor can they blame us for questioning their sincerity when they cry for union under such circumstances. And I here give due notice to all whom it may concern, that I will, God being my helper, promptly drive from the fold of which I am the appointed shepherd, all who may approach it for the purpose of stealing the sheep under my care; nor will I, in future, allow the too often deceptive and hypocritical cry of union to prevent my doing so. And I shall consider it my special duty to look after those who may be converted by our own labors; these are emphatically our children, and we may not allow them to be stolen from us. I have in the past, for the sake of peace, been more tolerant with proselyters than I mean to be in the future. I feel a good deal like the honest Quaker of whom it is said that he held to his principle of non-resistance till the pirates were boarding his ship, then he seized his cutlass and began to chop off their hands, exclaiming, "Keep thou thine and we'll keep ours!" That's my principle exactly. And I wish all to understand it. And I think that is the proper way to have union. And those who would not have their hands cut off must give over their piratical practices and keep on board their own ship!

Finally, I take it, that where full and explicit directions are not given in the New Testament with regard to the observance of any ordinance clearly of Divine appointment, such directions are to be sought for in the Old Testament; and if we there find clear and explicit directions given by the Almighty and practiced by the Old Testament church, these are obviously the directions to be followed; and we are not at liberty to give directions of our own invention as a substitute for them, simply because they were not formally repeated in the New Testament. Now, it is a fact, as we have already shown, that full and explicit directions are given in the Old Testament to use water by pouring or sprinkling as a sign of the baptism of the Spirit, and also as a sign of moral cleansing by the blood of Jesus; and as we know that baptism is a sign of both these, we are bound to follow these Old Testament directions, especially as the prophets had already apprized us that Jesus would "sprinkle many nations," and as we know that he actually and invariably baptizes by pouring, and also that he sprinkles the hearts of his people from an evil conscience. See Heb. x. 22. While furnished with such precept and example, so full and clear, I really think that we are not at liberty to invent a new method; much less are we at liberty to invent a method that is utterly without precedent and that cannot be used either as a sign or as a seal; nor do I think that we are at liberty to leave each one to choose a method of his own, simply because the method Divinely appointed and practiced under the Old Testament dispensation is not formally re-enacted under the New! To carry out this rule would be utterly disastrous to the Christian system. Of the truth of this statement any one will be convinced by a little reflection. For instance, by this rule we would do away with the Christian Sabbath, we would exclude females from the Holy Sacrament, we would do away with family worship, and, in short, as we have already said, to carry out this rule would be utterly ruinous to the Christian system; but if we follow the common sense rule, to observe and do all that the Lord our God has commanded, and never abrogated, all will be well. But if I should do away with God's method of applying the sign and seal, certainly plunging is the last method I should think of, for the idea of plunging for sealing is absurd in the last degree, nor is there anything in the Christian religion of which it is a sign!

And, though I admit that many human inventions were connected with Christian baptism, even at an early period, I do not admit that baptism proper was utterly done away with; on the contrary, it was retained, and like many other things of Divine appointment, it seemed extremely difficult to get rid of it. Like truth, it lived in the very rubbish of error; for, after passing through their various washings and other inventions, the finale was baptism proper by effusion. Of the truth of this observation, Taylor, in his Facts and Evidences, gives us very convincing proof. This scholarly and laborious investigator of this subject has presented us with twelve fac-similes or pictorial representations of the mode of baptism as administered by the ancients. In the course of his investigations and researches he found them in ancient churches and other places in the East. They are the work of Grecian and Roman artists, and unmistakably represent the practice of the times to which they belong; and every one of them represents the final act, baptism proper, as being administered by effusion. Some of them profess to represent the baptism of our blessed Lord by John; one professes to represent the baptism of the Emperor Constantine; another represents the baptism of a King and Queen, and others represent the baptism of other persons, some named and others not; but in every instance the water is represented as falling upon the subject. With these representations before us, we can but say with Mr. Taylor: "They are vouchers for the time in which they were executed; and, though we cannot hear the men of that generation viva voce, and we dare not put words into their lips, yet we may see their testimony and judge of its relevancy to the inquiry that engages our attention!"

But all this avails nothing with certain men; they still cry out, as they plunge, "There was no other way practiced for more than fifteen hundred years." But they probably know nothing about the editor of Calmet's Dictionary, or about his facts either; and, very likely, they do not desire to know, for assertion answers their purpose much better.

INFANT BAPTISM.

CHAPTER X.

Bitter opposition of Antipedobaptists to Infant Baptism—Grounds of their opposition examined and refuted.

Bitterly as the Anabaptists are opposed to baptism by sprinkling, or pouring, they are still more opposed to the baptism of children by any mode. To infant baptism they seem to retain the same bitterness that characterized the founders of their church, who, as D'Aubigne tells us, said, "Baptism is the baptism of a dog; there is no more use in baptizing an infant than in baptizing a cat." While in other particulars they differ very much and very honorably, from their ignorant and fanatical fathers, in this, we must say, they but too nearly resemble them: it is well known that they usually speak of the baptism of infants with contempt and bitterness; indeed they do not call it baptism at all, but "infant sprinkling." Though the child is consecrated to the adorable Trinity in the most solemn manner, by God's minister, in the use of the most appropriate and impressive ceremony, and accompanied by the most devout prayers of the whole church as they bow before the Lord in his house, yet all this is treated with contempt. And, although they do not use the coarse language of their fathers, as quoted above, yet the best they can do is to pronounce it "infant sprinkling," that is all it amounts to! Though the minister, the believing parents, and the church consecrated the child to the adorable Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, applying the seal of the covenant, and offering up the most devout prayers, still these sapient ones can see no more religion in it than they can see in the act of the servant-maid when she applies water to the child's face before dressing it; in either case it is only infant sprinkling; that is all!

But what reason do they assign for all this? What do they offer in justification hereof? Certainly nothing short of very serious and weighty considerations will justify this, if anything will. Do they claim that God has positively forbidden the baptism of children? That he has positively commanded, saying, "Thou shalt not baptize thy children at all?" No, they claim nothing of the sort; no one, however extravagant, ever claimed that there was any such command in God's book. What then? Do they claim that this solemn consecration corrupts the children, and makes them more wicked than the children that are not baptized? No, I think no one claims this. Why, then, are they so bitterly opposed to infant baptism? What reason or reasons do they offer as a justification of their bitter opposition and contempt of infant baptism? They shall speak for themselves. We believe the sum of all their reasons are the following:

They say the command is to baptize those who believe; but the child cannot believe, ergo, the child should not be baptized! In support of this strange reasoning they quote the following texts: Acts viii. 33, 37. The Eunuch said, "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" And Philip said, "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest." Mark xvi. 16. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." Here it is assumed that what God says to, or of, an adult, applies equally to an infant! Really it is difficult to conceive of an assumption more absurd than this. There are so many things wrong here, that one hardly knows where to commence to point them out. It is assumed that God makes no discrimination between an infant and an adult; that the provisions of the atonement are offered to the adult and to the infant upon the same terms; that all God says to the adult race of mankind, applies equally to infants; that you must not limit one jot or tittle of all he says to the adult race of mankind unless he distinctly tells you to do so! Can anything exceed this in extravagance and unreasonableness? In this way you would first starve to death, and then damn all children, and prove conclusively that God had so appointed; for he says, "if any will not work neither should he eat;" and he also says, "he that believeth not shall be damned." But infants can neither work nor believe, therefore they must first be starved to death and then damned! Now this is precisely the reasoning by which infants are excluded from the rite of baptism: in each case the conclusion is reached by assuming that infants are included, where adults only are intended! In this way precisely, it was, that the ancient sect of heretics called Hieraxites, concluded that all children dying in childhood would be damned, for they considered knowledge the procuring cause of salvation, and essential to it; and as infants had not, and could not have knowledge, they concluded they could not be saved! And they could establish their position just as satisfactorily as the Anabaptists establish theirs, for Paul says, "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." But infants are obviously incapable of hearing and knowing the teachings of God's Word, and consequently incapable of faith; and Jesus says he that believeth not shall be damned. Hence the same conclusion is reached, children cannot be saved. Moreover Jesus has said, "this is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." But children cannot have this knowledge, therefore they cannot have "life eternal!" Thus the reasoning of the ancient Hieraxites, and that of the modern Anabaptists, are exactly the same, and the conclusion the same; only in the one case the damnation of children is asserted, in the other the reasoners do not assert it, though their reasoning being the same implies it; for if the commission given to the disciples proves that infants cannot be baptized, because they cannot believe, it as conclusively proves that they cannot be saved, that they must be damned. Nay, there is more reason for the latter than there is for the former conclusion, for Jesus does not say, he that believeth not shall not be baptized, but he does say, he that believeth not shall be damned. And even if he had said, he that believeth not shall not be baptized, even then it would not follow that infants should not be baptized, for the objects of the threat are obviously those to whom the Gospel should be preached, but the Apostles were not sent out into the world to preach the Gospel to infants, therefore the threat had nothing to do with infants, it neither excluded them from baptism nor from heaven, any more than it excluded from heaven those adults in heathen lands, who never had the chance either to hear a preached gospel, or to be baptized. The argument which Anabaptists deduce, or pretend to deduce from Philip's address to the Eunuch is, of course, based upon the same ridiculous assumption; they assume that what Philip says to the Eunuch equally applies to infants; that all infants are to be saved and baptized upon precisely the same conditions that the Eunuch was; and they would have us address all infants just as Philip addressed the "man of Ethiopia, an Eunuch of great authority under Candace, Queen of the Ethiopians, who had the charge of all her treasure, and had come to Jerusalem to worship." Yes, the assumption is that all infants must be treated precisely as was this great official, and saved and baptized on the very same conditions! Is it not marvelous that any intelligent person should assume and reason in this way? And yet, it is upon this assumption, principally, that the Anabaptists base all their opposition to infant baptism; they are ever and anon quoting these texts to prove that infants should not be baptized because they cannot believe. And why? Because, forsooth, Philip said to the Eunuch, "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest be baptized," therefore they would have all ministers of the Gospel deal with infants just as Philip dealt with this great official, the Ethiopian Eunuch, who came to Jerusalem to worship!

Anabaptists say there is no command in the New Testament to baptize infants, therefore they should not be baptized. This argument, if it may be called an argument, is like all the preceding; it rests upon a mere assumption, which is little, if anything, better than the assumptions already exposed and refuted. The assumption is this; that no command in the Old Testament is binding, or to be observed, unless formally repeated in the New. This assumption, if fully carried out, would be little less disastrous than the preceding. Now, with regard to the commands and teachings of the Old Testament, the question is not, are they repeated in the New? but are they abrogated in the New? If not, of course the obligation to obey, remains unchanged and unabated; and must continue till the law in the given case is abrogated by Him who enacted it. Now every Christian knows, or should know, that the law with regard to children was enacted in the days of Abraham, and its observance made binding upon the Church, and it has been observed by the church of God, without intermission, from then until now; and that law is recorded in the Old Testament, and it is not abrogated in the New! These are the facts in the case, and such facts as defy successful contradiction. Now, the law is simply this; that children should be circumcised, even as soon as they were eight days old, and that circumcision was the rite of initiation into the Church; it was also the seal of the Covenant; nay, St. Paul tells us that it was the sign, and seal, of righteousness had previous to the performance of the rite. Now, then, here is the fact, the indisputable fact; that rite which included all that we have here specified, was, by the command of God, extended to children, even as soon as they were eight days old! But I will be told that baptism does not take the place of circumcision; I answer, I care not a rush, I am not talking about that just now, we will attend to that in due time. What I claim just now is simply this; at the time that the church was formally organized, the covenant between God and his people was ratified with Abraham, who, with his children, received the seal of that covenant, and this seal was at the same time the sign and seal of RIGHTEOUSNESS previously had, and it was also the rite of initiation into the church of God. And all this, by the command of God, was secured to the infant in common with the parent, and this command was never abrogated! Now, we repeat the statement, and we repeat it with increased emphasis, the question is not whether this command is repeated in the New Testament; the question is, is it abrogated in the New Testament? To this question there is but one answer, and that is NO! We affirm that God has not canceled this command, nor has he canceled one jot or tittle of the rights, privileges and blessings which it secures to children; and if the Anabaptists undertake to do so, they do it on their own authority, and at their own risk. Instead, then, of the Anabaptists asking us, where is this command in the New Testament? we ask them where is it abrogated in the New Testament? And till they can point to the positive annulment, or repeal of this law, they are bound to do as we do; and if they still refuse to obey this confessedly unrepealed law of God, they do so at their own risk, and we must recognize them as transgressors of that law; and as attempting to deprive children of rights and blessings secured to them by the blood of the covenant, and by the promise and command of the Most High. We say the promise and the command: for when God made the covenant with Abraham, and specified the rights and blessings thus secured, he added, "thee and thy seed," and on the day of Pentecost this promise was repeated in these words, "the promise is to you and to your children." The practice of attempting to annul or evade a Divine law that was enacted long ago, simply because it has not been re-enacted, is as absurd as it is pernicious. Suppose one should attempt to evade or annul some of the laws of this State or nation, and plead in justification the fact that they were not re-enacted at the last session of the Legislature; would not the very children tell him that re-enactment was not necessary. That every law remained in force, till repealed by the power that enacted it? And this is specially true of the laws of God. Yet the Anabaptists attempt to evade, or annul the law under consideration, simply because it has not been formally re-enacted or repeated in the New Testament! I say formally, for it has been repeated, though not with its original formality, for this was not necessary.

CHAPTER XI.

It is shown that Infant Baptism takes the place of Circumcision—
Early Christian Fathers are quoted—Testimony of Pelagius—
The Antipedobaptist dogma one of the most modern of religious errors—Baxter is quoted—Other Fathers are quoted.

Though it is not at all necessary to the validity of the position here taken to prove that baptism takes the place of circumcision, yet being convinced that it does, I will make a few remarks which I think will satisfy the unprejudiced that it does.

Circumcision and the passover are unquestionably done away with by Him who appointed them. And Baptism and the Lord's Supper are unquestionably appointed by the same authority. The doing away of the former, and the appointment of the latter, took place at the same time, and the disuse of the former, and the use of the latter, have continued in the Christian Church to the present day; and it is not questioned that the supper takes the place of the passover; and, if baptism does not take the place of circumcision, then we have nothing in its place. But the truth is, this is neither more nor less than saying and unsaying, and such saying and unsaying as leave the facts unaltered; for the facts that circumcision was done away with, and baptism introduced at the same time, and by the same authority, remain facts, whatever we may say. And it is both folly and contradiction to say that the one does not take the place of the other: and especially when it is remembered and admitted, as it must be, that baptism is what circumcision was; viz., a sign and seal, and also an initiatory rite. The amount is this, to express it still more briefly: He who appointed circumcision for the purposes here specified, has appointed baptism for the same specified purposes; and the annulment of the one, and the appointment of the other, took place at the same time. Now, to admit all this, and yet deny that the one takes the place of the other, is, I maintain, folly and self-contradiction. Folly, because nothing is gained by it, for the facts remain, and they comprehend all we claim, viz: the rights of children under the present as under the former dispensation. And it is self-contradiction, for that which is denied is the very same that has been admitted by admitting the facts, which must be admitted; and the facts comprehend all we claim. Our claims, therefore, are established with all the certainty of fact, notwithstanding the play upon the words take the place of, for the objection is really a play upon these words. It is admitted that the one was removed, and the other appointed, and that the latter answers the purposes of the former, and yet it is denied that the latter takes the place of the former! Nonsense! the fact is, no man would ever have said so had it not appeared to him that the admission would militate against his system.

Water baptism is substituted for circumcision because, while it answers all the purposes of the former, as specified above, it does more. It is more congenial with the milder dispensation of the Gospel, which is emphatically the dispensation of the spirit. And it is a sign of the baptism of the spirit, as circumcision cannot be. Hence, under that dispensation there was divinely appointed sprinkling and pouring in connection with it; while under this dispensation baptism answers all the purposes.

It also does away with the distinction which necessarily existed between male and female while circumcision was in use. The doing away of this distinction, by substituting baptism for circumcision, is very forcibly and beautifully expressed by the apostle Paul in the following words; "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." (Gal. iii. 7, 8.) To prove that baptism does not take the place of circumcision, certain ignorant persons, and among them sometimes females, have urged the fact that while circumcision was not, baptism is, administered to females. To such females we recommend Paul's very sensible and appropriate advice: "Let them ask their husbands at home." And if their husbands are as ignorant as themselves, which is very likely, we can only sympathize with them. Meantime we claim that the words quoted above prove just the reverse of what the objector designs to prove by the fact stated. That baptism takes the place of circumcision is evident from the following Scripture also. Speaking of our completeness in Christ, the apostle says to the Colossians: "In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ, buried with Him in baptism." &c. (Col. ii. 11, 12.) Having quoted this text, Mr. Watson observes, having specified other particulars in which baptism takes the place of circumcision: "Here baptism is made the initiatory rite of the new dispensation, that by which the Colossians were joined to Christ in whom they are said to be 'complete;' and so certain is it that baptism has the same office and import now as circumcision formerly,—with this difference only, that the object of faith was then future, and now it is Christ as come—that the Apostle expressly calls baptism 'the circumcision of Christ;' the circumcision instituted by Him, which phrase he puts out of the reach of frivolous criticism, by adding exegetically, 'buried with Him in baptism.' For unless the Apostle here calls baptism 'the circumcision of Christ,' he asserts that we 'put off the body of the sins of the flesh,' that is, become new creatures by virtue of our Lord's own personal circumcision; but if this be absurd, then the only reason for which he can call baptism 'the circumcision of Christ,' or Christian circumcision, is, that it has taken the place of the Abrahamic circumcision, and fulfills the same office of introducing believing men into God's covenant, and entitling them to the enjoyment of spiritual blessings." The phrase, circumcision of Christ, so evidently means Christian baptism, that this close and accurate reasoner does not hesitate to say that Paul himself has "put it out of the reach of frivolous criticism." Doddridge, too, in his notes on the place, takes the same view. Having quoted the words "putting off the body of the sins of the flesh," he adds, "renouncing all the deeds of it. Your engagements to this you have expressed by that ordinance which I may call the circumcision of Christ; it being that by which he hath appointed that we should be initiated into His Church as the members of it." Thus he represents Paul as saying of baptism, "that ordinance which I may call the circumcision of Christ." The propriety of all this will appear still more clear when it is remembered that baptism and circumcision symbolize the same thing, namely, the removal of moral uncleanness; though they do it in different ways, yet both are very significant of this thing. Hence Philo, as quoted by Whitby, says that "circumcision imports the cutting off our sinful pleasures and passions, and our impious opinions." What circumcision represents by cutting off, baptism still more forcibly represents by the idea of washing away. And Peter, referring both to circumcision and baptism, speaks of them as symbolizing this moral cleansing by "the putting away of the filth of the flesh." Moral impurity is often called filth, both in the Old and New Testaments. See, for instance, Isaiah iv. 4, Ezek. xxxii. 25, and Rev. xxii. 11.

After showing, at great length, and by most conclusive evidence, that Christian baptism takes the place of circumcision, Mr. Watson adds: "This argument is sufficiently extended to show that the Antipedobaptist writers have in vain endeavored to prove that baptism has not been appointed in the room of circumcision; a point on which, indeed, they were bound to employ all their strength; for the substitution of baptism for circumcision being established, one of their main objections to infant baptism, as we will just now show, is rendered wholly nugatory." Having adduced the further evidence here promised, he sums up thus: "If, then, we bring all these considerations under one view, we shall find it sufficiently established that baptism is the sign and seal of the covenant of grace under its perfected dispensation;—that it is the grand initiatory act by which we enter into this covenant in order to claim all its spiritual blessings, and to take upon ourselves all its obligations;—that it was appointed by Jesus Christ in a manner which plainly put it in the place of circumcision;—that it is now the means by which men become Abraham's spiritual children, and heirs with him of the promise, which was the office of circumcision, until the seed, the Messiah, should come;—and that baptism is therefore expressly called by St. Paul, 'the circumcision of Christ,' or Christian circumcision, in a sense which can only import that baptism has now taken the place of the Abrahamic rite." After refuting another objection of Antipedobaptist writers, stated by Mr. Booth, Mr. Watson concludes thus: "We may here add that an early father, Justin Martyr, takes the same view of the substitution of circumcision by Christian baptism: 'We Gentiles,' Justin observes, 'have not received that circumcision according to the flesh, but that which is spiritual—and moreover, for indeed we were sinners, we have received this in baptism, through God's mercy, and it is enjoined on all to receive it in like manner.'" According to this father, circumcision is received in baptism, and it is enjoined upon all! But this same ancient father is still more distinct in the following quotation, which is handed down to us as containing his words verbatim: "We Gentile Christians are circumcised by baptism with Christ's circumcision;" and in support of this view he quotes Col. ii. 11, 12. He also says, "we were disciplined in our childhood." Now when it is remembered that this father was born about A. D. 133, and that he is here defending the practice of the whole Christian Church in opposition to the Jews, who still contended for circumcision, it must be admitted, we think, that this testimony is overwhelmingly conclusive. Not because his testimony or practice, or that of any other man, or number of men, is a rule for us when unsupported by Scripture, but because it is quite sufficient to show what were the facts with regard to the views and the practice of the early Christian Church; so early that some still living were familiar with some of the apostles, at least with the Apostle John and his teachings; and their views, according to the testimony of this father, were that baptism took the place of circumcision; and, accordingly, that they "disciplined," that is, baptized in "childhood." Turning to Taylor's "Facts and Evidences," I find that writer furnishes the following quotation from this same Justin Martyr: "Why, if circumcision be a good thing, do we not use it as well as the Jews did? The answer is, because we Gentile Christians are circumcised by baptism with Christ's circumcision." Now this shows most conclusively what were the views and practice of the primitive Church with regard to baptism. Their views were that Christ gave baptism in the place of circumcision, and that they practiced accordingly; for if these were not the views and practice of the primitive Church this prominent minister could not write and publish what every Christian then living must have known to be a glaring falsehood. It would not be possible, for instance, for a prominent minister in the Anabaptist church of the present day to publish a treatise in defense of baptism by sprinkling, and especially in defense of the baptism of infants, asserting that these were the views and practice of the entire church of which he was a minister, and that they did so upon the authority of Christ and his apostles, and that they had always believed and practiced thus; I say no such minister could do so while in a sane state; and if he should, of course the whole Anabaptist church would contradict and reject his statement. Let it be acknowledged, then, as we think every intelligent and honest man must acknowledge that Justin Martyr and other fathers could not write thus if these were not the views and practice of the primitive Church; and if these were evidently the views and practice of the primitive Church, with what face can Anabaptist ministers tell the masses of the people, who know no better, that the baptism of infants is a modern, a popish invention? The best excuse we can possibly make for such ministers is that they themselves are ignorant; "the blind lead the blind." Mr. Taylor also gives us the following quotation from the writings of John Chrysostom: "There was pain and trouble in the practice of that Jewish circumcision; but our circumcision, I mean the grace of baptism, gives cure without pain; and this for infants as well as men." Here, as late as the latter end of the 4th century, this father still speaks of the "Jewish circumcision" and "our circumcision," and by "our circumcision" he tells us he means baptism, and, observe, he is not speaking of his views and practice, but of those of the entire Christian Church at that time, as Justin Martyr had done more than two hundred years before.

The incident that is recorded as having occurred at the council of Carthage is well known. The substance of it is this: One Fedus, not being present at the Council, wrote to the presiding bishop, Cyprian, to know whether a child should be baptized before it was eight days old; to this inquiry Cyprian and the whole Council, consisting of sixty-six bishops, replied that it was not necessary to delay baptism till the eighth day. Now I will simply ask, could an Antipedobaptist minister write thus to a council of sixty-six of his brethren? and could such a council reply as did that at Carthage? To these questions there is of course but one answer, and that is No; such a communication could not be sent to such a body and receive such an answer; and, for the same reason, it was not possible that such a communication could have been sent to the Council at Carthage and receive the reply here recorded, if, as we are told, by the Antipedobaptists, the whole Christian Church then believed and practiced as they do now ; nor could Fedus have thus written, nor was it possible for the Council to reply as it did, had not the baptism of children been the belief and practice of the primitive Church ! What, then, can we think of those who assert, as was publicly asserted here of late, that the practice of the present Anabaptist church was the only practice “ for more than fifteen hundred years ? ” We certainly have but too much reason to conclude that such men have learned, and do understand the fact, that bold assertions will answer their purpose better than argument with a certain class !

The fact is, though at a very early period, there were many departures from apostolic teaching and practice, it does not seem to have occurred to the most daring of the inventors of error to deny children the right of baptism. Hence, when Pelagius was charged with this, he seems to have been perfectly shocked, even as much as if he had been charged with murder. Hence he complains thus : “ Men slander me as if I denied the Sacrament of Baptism to infants,” and having denied the slander with horror, he says he never heard even of the most impious heretic that was guilty of doing so ! See Hibbard on Infant Baptism, p. 217. The truth is, the exclusion of infants from Christian baptism, is amongst the most modern of human inventions, as a religious dogma. Hence Baxter says : “ I am fully satisfied that you cannot show me any society, I think not one man, that ever objected to infant baptism till about two hundred years ago. I find Christ did once place little children in the Church, and no man breathing can show me one word of Scripture where ever Christ did put them out again." "About two hundred years ago." He refers to the origin of the Anabaptist views by John Mathias and King John of Leyden, and other German fanatics in the days of Luther. Before this time we do not remember to have read of a single individual who is even charged with excluding infants from baptism, unless it be Pierre de Bruis, in the 12th century, and the record is very unreliable, for the charge is brought against him by the Abbot Clugny, his deadly enemy. The charge which the Abbot brings against him is this. The Abbot says: "He," Pierre de Bruis, "denies that children, before they arrive at years of intelligence, can be saved by baptism, or that the faith of another person can be useful to them, since, according to those of his opinion, it is not the faith of another which saves, but the faith of the individual with baptism, according to our Lord's words—'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned!'" From the quotation itself I am strongly inclined to believe that the charge is not truthful; for the wording of the charge conveys to me the idea that the opposition of Bruis was not to the baptism of children, but to the Popish dogma that children are saved by baptism and cannot be saved without it; for the Abbot charges him with denying that children "can be saved by baptism," and he no doubt did deny that children were saved by baptism in the Popish sense; but could we hear him speak for himself we would, no doubt, hear him deny the other part of the charge as Pelagius did, for he was a good man, and was burned for his adherence to the truth, in 1126. It is probably to this man that Baxter refers when he says: "I think not one man." The case of Pierre de Bruis, as here referred to, may be found in the History of the Vaudois, by Antoine Monastier.

In addition to the quotations already given from the fathers, we will add the following, which we find in our memoranda, but cannot say what we quoted from; they are, however, faithful quotations, which we made in the course of our reading. Irenæus speaks of the baptism of "infants, little ones and children." He flourished about A. D., 178, and was acquainted with Polycarp, who was a disciple of the Apostle John. Origen refers to infant baptism in proof of original sin, and says the Church baptized infants "because the apostles commanded it." He flourished in the third century. Ambrose, too, refers to the baptism of infants in proof of original sin, and says "it was practiced in the Apostles' times." He wrote in the fourth century. Augustine, too, makes a similar statement for the same purpose, and says of infant baptism that "it was practiced in the apostles' times." He wrote in the fifth century. In defense of the same doctrine, Chrysostom says: "For this reason we baptize infants also." He wrote in the fourth century. Tertullian, we are told, advised the delay of infant baptism, but this whim resulted from another error which he had embraced, viz.: that they were saved by baptism, and that, consequently, if any one died after baptism, before committing sin, such an one was saved; but, errorist as he was, he was no Antipedobaptist. To these testimonies we may add the fact that the Greek Church does, and always did, baptize infants. Speaking of Tertullian, Mr. Watson says, vol. ii. p. 645: "So little, indeed, were Tertullian's absurdities regarded, that he appears to have been quite forgotten by this time, for Augustine says he never heard of any Christian, Catholic or Sectary, who taught any other doctrine than that infants are to be baptized."—De Pece. Mor. Cap. 6

CHAPTER XII.

It is shown that Infant Baptism has been practiced from Apostolic times—Not one clear case of Opposition to Infant Baptism till the Sixteenth Century—Appealing to and Reasoning with the Antipedobaptists—Astounding Facts Stated—They cannot tell us when the practice of Baptizing Infants commenced—We can tell them When and by Whom Opposition thereto commenced—Infant Baptism the Uncontradicted Practice of the Church from Apostolic till Modern times.

Now, in view of this overwhelming array of testimony, and we could add much more, we will indulge in a few brief reflections, to which we invite the serious attention of all, whether Pedobaptist or Antipedobaptist. And, first, observe, we do not produce the teaching and example of either the ancients or the moderns to prove that children should be baptized; though teaching and practice so uniform are not to be disregarded even as proof, nevertheless, for our authority and proof we rely upon the word of God. But we produce all this array of testimony and practice to prove that infant baptism is no innovation, that it has been practiced from apostolic times to the present time, as circumcision was in all the previous ages of the Church! As late as the 5th century, Augustine and Pelagius, who were opposed in other things, give their testimony to this fact, that they never heard of one, no, not the most impious heretic, who opposed infant baptism, or taught any other doctrine; and Baxter asserts that he never heard of a society, he thinks not a single individual, who opposed infant baptism till about two hundred years before his time, that is, till the sixteenth century! What an astounding fact! For a period of some fifteen hundred years, dating from apostolic times, not a single clear case of opposition to infant baptism in all Christendom; though during that period the devil and errorists seem to have introduced every imaginable error save that of the Antipedobaptists; for some reason they did not dare to introduce this error till the sixteenth century from the Christian era; surely this is one of the most wonderful facts of history! We may safely say, I think, that during this period every other doctrine of the Christian system was assailed, in one way or other, but it remained for the crazy, lawless, German fanatics of the sixteenth century to attack the doctrine, the Christian doctrine, of infant baptism, and found an Antipedobaptist Church!

To the Antipedobaptists we say: "Come, now, and let us reason together;" do not get vexed with our statement of facts, or with our reflections upon these facts; we are honest, we are sincere, we believe what we say, we are searching after the truth as well as the facts in the case, and if we know ourselves we are prepared to receive the truth wherever we find it. If, as you say, infant baptism is an innovation, a novelty, a human invention; will you please tell us when and where this novelty, this human invention, was introduced, and by whom? Or, if you cannot tell us the time when, and the persons by whom, it was introduced, will you be good enough to point us to a period since the Christian era, when it was not practiced? We cannot find such a period, Baxter could not find such a period, nor could he point to a single society that ever opposed the doctrine till the period specified; nor could any of the Christian Fathers point to such a party in their time, or "in the old time before them," nor could they point us to a period since the Christian era when infant baptism was not practiced. Many others, too, very many, of the learned and wise have searched with great care and perseverance, but they have all failed, utterly failed, to discover a period since the Christian era when infant baptism was not practiced in the Christian Church. Now, if the Antipedobaptists have discovered what all others have failed to discover, will they be good enough to favor us with the discovery? Will they tell us at what period since the apostolic times infant baptism was introduced into the Christian Church? As honest men they are bound to do this, or never again call it a novelty, an innovation. If it is an innovation, how is it that unlike all other innovations, its introduction called forth no opposition or discussion? It is a fact that children were received into the Church by the divinely appointed initiatory rite from the days of Abraham till the days of the apostles. Now, is it possible that a divine appointment of so long standing, of such vital importance, and so wide in its application as to embrace all the children of all the worshippers of the true God, could be abrogated and no one know when the abrogation took place? Is it possible that all the children of all the worshippers of the true God could at once be excluded from the Church of God without opposition or complaint from either Jew or Gentile? Or, if there was complaint or opposition, is it possible that all the facts in the case could have been excluded from history, so completely excluded that we do not find in any of the Church Councils the record of one jot or tittle of complaint, opposition or even discussion with regard to the exclusion of children from their long and divinely-appointed place in the Church of God? Is it possible that believing parents could be all at once so divested of all natural and religious feeling that they could submit to have their children excluded from the Covenant and Church of God without offering any resistance, objection or even complaint? Is it possible that the Jews, whose children under the former dispensation had been received into the Church, received into covenant relation to God, and had received the sign and seal of the covenant, is it possible, I say, that these Jews could all at once submit to the annulment, the reversion, of all this without opposition or complaint, especially as no one produced, or pretended to produce, a jot or tittle of divine authority for this serious change in the divine constitution? Is it possible that the unbelieving Jews, the deadly enemies of the new dispensation, who sought every occasion to object to and depreciate the Christian system, could fail to notice a change which afforded such just ground for objection and opposition? Or if they did object and oppose, is it possible that history could be entirely silent with regard to these facts? Is it possible that neither Jew nor Gentile, inspired or uninspired, believing or unbelieving, should ever record one jot or tittle with regard to the change, or the opposition thereto, if such change and opposition had taken place? Now, in answer to all these questions we do not hesitate to reply, No; such a change could not take place without opposition, complaint or discussion; much less could it take place without any one knowing when, how or by whom it was made. We therefore conclude that the change did not take place; we must so conclude, for the contrary conclusion would be in favor of what we claim to be impossible!

The Antipedobaptists have not to ask us when, how and by whom their dogma was introduced; we tell them without being asked. We tell them the time when, the place where, and the parties by whom their antisciptural dogma was introduced. We tell them the opposition that its introduction met with, and who they were who made the opposition to it; even Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, and, in short, the entire Christian world, with the exception of the few lawless fanatics who introduced it, and who were the cause of much disgrace and injury to the great reformation. And we refer them to the pages of history, where they may find the facts recorded! And we challenge them to show us, to tell us when, where and by whom their antisciptural novelty was introduced before this time; and we claim that their inability to do so makes our argument as complete as argument can be! Wall says that Peter Bruis, about 1130, was the first Antipedobaptist teacher who had a regular congregation. (Hist., part 2, c. 7.) Even if this were admitted, it would not help the matter, it only shows that Antipedobaptism is an innovation of comparatively modern introduction. But we have already shown that there is no evidence that this man ever opposed infant baptism as being unscriptural. Bishop Tomlin says that the Anabaptists of Germany took their rise in the beginning of the 16th century; but it does not appear that there was any congregation of Anabaptists in England till the year 1640. This is without doubt the origin of the present Antipedobaptist Church, as we have already shown. If they had an existence before then, let them show us when and where!

Closing his arguments in favor of infant baptism, Mr. Watson says, "that a practice which can be traced up to the very first periods of the Church, and has been till within very modern times, its uncontradicted practice, should have a lower authority than apostolic usage and appointment, may be pronounced impossible. It is not like one of those trifling though somewhat superstitious additions, which even in early times began to be made to the sacraments; on the contrary, it involves a principle so important as to alter the very nature of the sacrament itself." Inst., vol. ii. p. 646. Mark these two statements in this quotation; till within very modern times infant baptism was the uncontradicted practice of the Church. Second, the Antipedobaptist dogma involves a principle so important as to alter the very nature of the sacrament itself! Let it be borne in mind, then, that this Antipedobaptist dogma is not only a novelty, but a very serious error, as we shall show more fully pretty soon.

CHAPTER XIII.

The objection that Infant Baptism is incompatible with Man's Natural Rights is shown to be ridiculous—It contains the very germ of Infidelity and even Atheism—Objection that Circumcision was a Civil Contract is Refuted—Many absurdities exposed.

Finally, lest all the other objections to infant baptism should prove insufficient, Antipedobaptists tell us that it is incompatible with man's natural rights; that baptism should be delayed till the child is capable of choosing for itself! This objection is not only ridiculous, but it contains the very germ of infidelity. The late Robert Owen, the founder of that form of infidelity called Socialism, took the same ground, and insisted that all religious instruction should be delayed till the child is at least thirteen years old! Truly, the devil spoke like himself when he made this proposal. I say this objection contains the very germ of infidelity, for it is in direct opposition to well-known Bible teaching; seeing that book informs us that God commanded the child to be consecrated to himself, and the seal of the covenant applied as early as eight days after the child is born. It is clear, then, that the issue is joined, not with us, but with Bible teaching, known, unmistakable Bible teaching: And, as we before showed, it will not mend the matter to say that baptism does not take the place of circumcision, for the facts are not altered at all; if baptism is incompatible with man's natural rights, so was circumcision, seeing it laid the child under as much obligation as does baptism. Nor will it do for the Anabaptists to say, as they have said, that circumcision was a civil contract, and that the obligations and blessings involved were of a temporal character; for surely it is not a greater interference with the child's natural rights to lay it under obligations to serve Almighty God than it is to lay it under obligations of a civil or national character. But the fact is, this objection of the Antipedobaptists only serves to show the desperation of their case; for the moral character of the Abrahamic covenant, of which circumcision was the seal, is unmistakably taught both in the Old and New Testaments, as the following texts do most clearly show. Jer. iv. 4: "Circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your heart, ye men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem." Deut. xxx. 6: "And the Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live." Deut. x. 15, 16: "Only the Lord had a delight in thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, as it is this day. Circumcise therefore, the foreskin of your heart, and be no more stiffnecked." Romans ii. 28: "For he is not a Jew which is one outwardly in the flesh; but he is a Jew which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men but of God." St. Paul says: "Abraham received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had, yet being uncircumcised." A careful study of these and similar texts, which abound in the Old and New Testaments, will satisfy any one that circumcision was the seal of the covenant of grace, and a seal of righteousness or justification, previously had, and that it was also a sign of moral purity or sanctification; this was signified by the removal, or "putting away" of "the filth of the flesh;" it was also a sign or badge of the peculiar relation which the circumcised party sustained to God. Now, with such teachings as these before us, I think it is not saying too much to say that it must be a bad cause which forces its advocates to say that circumcision was merely a civil transaction, and that it only involved temporal blessings and obligations. And its badness becomes still more apparent when it forces its advocates to say that such a transaction is incompatible with man's natural rights! for that is a declared opposition to the teachings of God's word, and is, therefore, infidel in its principle, as we before said.

This objection not only contains the germ of infidelity, but it contains the germ of atheism; for it assumes it to be the natural right of the child to choose whether he shall or shall not be consecrated to God Almighty; whether he shall or shall not acknowledge his obligations to and serve God Almighty. This objection assumes it to be an open question whether the God who created and redeemed has a right to put forth such claims, and that all these questions are to be left undecided till the child is of age to choose and decide for itself; that its judgment and authority in the case are superior to those of the Almighty; and that the Almighty has no right or authority to decide in the case till he first consults the child after it is capable of judging in the case, and obtains its consent! It assumes, too, that revelation and man's natural rights are at variance, that the former is subversive of the latter, and, therefore, unjust, and should not be submitted to! It assumes – what does it assume? In a word, everything that is wrong and nothing that is right. And yet we have listened to, and even countenanced this antipedo, this infidel, this atheistical objection, till both parents and children in our very churches have learned to utter it in justification of their opposition, their daring opposition to the plain teachings of God's word!

But the absurd, as well as the infidel and atheistical character of this objection deserves specification. If in deference to the natural rights of children, we may not consecrate them to God, may not receive them into the Church, into the covenant of grace, and apply to them the seal of that covenant; may not lay them under obligation to serve God when they come to the years of understanding, what may we do? On the same principle I do not see why we should not leave them to choose what teacher they shall have, what school they shall go to, what kind of instruction they shall have, or whether they shall have any instruction at all. And if we do, I am strongly inclined to believe that they will choose the latter; and if they should, I do not see what right we have to oppose their choice, any more than we had a right to choose for them before they were capable of making a choice ! Nor do I see what right we have, on this principle, to choose anything for the child, not even the kind of dress it shall wear, or whether it shall wear any dress at all ! And the probability is that it would not, if left to its own choice. In all likelihood, if left to itself, it would, if it should live, be alike destitute of learning, clothing and religion ! Such, doubtless, would be the result of this Antipedobaptist objection if fully carried out. And after experimenting thus upon it for a few years, we would, doubtless, have a better knowledge of it than we have now ; but the knowledge would be very dearly bought ! As it is never wise to experiment upon error, let us rather abide by the good old way, and experiment upon the truth, even the truth enjoined upon us in the following Scriptures : “ Ye stand this day all of you before the Lord your God ; your captains of your tribes, your elders and your officers, with all the men of Israel, your LITTLE ONES, your wives and thy stranger that is in thy camp, from the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water ; that thou shouldst ENTER INTO COVENANT with the Lord thy God, AND INTO THE OATH which the Lord thy God maketh with thee this day.” And now that your little ones as well as yourselves sustain a covenant relation to God, see that you consult not their choice, but the word of your covenant God, and teach them to “ observe and do all his commandments.” “ And these words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart ; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shall talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." Thus "train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Here you have God's command and God's promise; keep them as did Abraham, of whom the Lord hath said: "I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment." Rest assured of it that it will be much wiser to do this than to leave your children "to choose for themselves." If, in reply to all this, the Anabaptist should say: "But we do teach our children;" then, my reply is, never more tell us to leave our children "to choose for themselves." Nor are you at liberty to choose for yourself, even as to what you shall or shall not teach; you are bound both "to teach and do all that the Lord thy God hath commanded thee." And he hath taught thee to consecrate thy children, as well as thyself, to him in holy baptism; as we shall now show by proof drawn more directly from His own word.

CHAPTER XIV.

Direct Scripture proof—Infants have the necessary Qualifications for Baptism—Their claim more clear than that of any adult—Romans, v. 12, 18, 19, explained—The infant has ‘the same qualifications for baptism that Abraham had for circumcision; the same that believing adults have for baptism—A close connection between Infant Baptism and Infant Salvation on the one hand, and between Antipedobaptism and Infant Damnation on the other—Remarks on the moral nature of Infants.

We will now defend infant baptism by a direct appeal to the word of God. And in doing this we purpose to show that the infant derives its right to baptism, not from its parents or from the Church, but from Jesus Christ, through whose atonement it has also a qualification for baptism, and that qualification is justification; and both the right to, and qualification for, baptism, it has unconditionally. And both the right to, and qualification for, baptism being unconditional, it will follow, of course, that if any one infant has the right and the qualification, all infants have; unless it can be shown that Jesus did not die for all; and this cannot be shown till it is first shown that the following and similar declarations contain a falsehood. “One died for all.” “He, by the grace of God, tasted death for every man.” Now, we take the ground that what is thus secured to infants, cannot be taken from them by the whims and fancies of men, nor yet by the enactments of Synods and Councils. True, men may deprive infants of baptism as they may deprive them of food, but their right thereto remains unalienated and inalienable!

Having thus stated our position and purpose, we now proceed to the proof.

The first Scripture we quote is from the fifth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. We quote verses 12, 18 and 19 together, because they are evidently connected, the intervening verses being parenthetical. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. Therefore, as by the offense of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous."

Let us now carefully notice what it is that Paul says "came upon all men," and how it came. And, observe, we have nothing to do just here with what came, or may come, upon any individual by his own individual acts; we have only to do with what "came upon all," "by one."

Here are the specifications; some of them are quoted from the parenthetical verses, they being explanatory of the verses which we have quoted above:

"By one man sin entered into the world." "Judgment came upon all men." That is, the sentence of the Judge, or, as we sometimes say, the sentence of a broken law; and that sentence is specifically declared to be "condemnation," "death."

We now enquire how was all this brought, or caused by one? The answer is, "by one that sinned;" "by one man's offence;" "by one man's disobedience;" by "Adam's transgression."

So much "came upon all men," in the way here specified. So far there can be no mistake, for we have Paul's declaration for every particular. Of course the judgment, or sentence, was not fully executed upon our first parents, in consequence of the gracious interposition of our Savior. If it had been, it would have extended to their unborn posterity, resulting in the non-existence thereof; so that the entire posterity of the guilty pair owe their very existence to Jesus! But we are anticipating the next question.

Having seen what it is that "came upon all by one," even by Adam; let us now see what it is that "came upon all men" by one, even by Christ.

Here, too, let it be distinctly noticed, we have nothing to do with what came, or may come, upon any individual conditionally, for what is here specified "came" before those to whom it "came" were capable of performing a condition; this is not only stated by the apostle at different times, especially in this chapter, and more especially in the verses quoted above, but it is implied in the very specifications themselves. The specifications are these: "The grace of God;" "the free gift;" "the gift of grace."

And all this "came upon all unto justification of life." The "judgment" which "came upon all" was "unto condemnation," and the "free gift" which "came upon all" was "unto justification of life." In the one case, "condemnation" came, and life was forfeited; in the other, "justification" came, and life was restored; and, all this, in each case, so far as Adam's posterity was concerned, without their own personal act; the "condemnation" came through Adam, the "justification" through Christ.

But how did this "grace of God," and this "gift of grace," "come upon all?" The apostle tells us in the following words: "By the righteousness of ONE;" "by the obedience of ONE." The results of Adam's sin to his infant posterity, are removed by Christ's righteousness; the results of Adam's "disobedience" to his infant posterity are removed by the "obedience" of Christ, who "became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." Thus the great REDEEMER, the RESTORER, has fairly met the results of Adam's "offense," so far as his unacting posterity are concerned, and it is of them that we are now speaking. The "condemnation" that came upon Adam's posterity, by Adam's disobedience without their own act, is removed by the "justification" that came through Christ's righteousness without their own act. So that every infant sustains a justified relation to God, through Christ's atonement, and this is its qualification for baptism; and this same justification is that which qualifies adult believers for baptism; and it was justification that qualified Abraham for circumcision; and all this Paul asserts and proves in the

Scripture before us. In the last verse of the fourth chapter, he says "Christ was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our δικαιωσιν, justification; and in the 18th verse of the following chapter, when speaking of what "came upon all" through the sin of Adam, and the righteousness of Christ, he says, "by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto δικαιωσιν ζωης, justification of life. Now this very blessing he tells us Abraham received not by works but by faith. And in the 11th verse of the fourth chapter we are told "he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised." The word which in this verse is translated righteousness is the same in the original as that translated justification in verse 25 of the same chapter, and in verse 18 of the following chapter, as any one may see by looking into his Greek Testament; and Dr. Adam Clarke says "it is best rendered justification, as expressing that pardon and salvation offered to us in the Gospel." A righteous act, a righteous state, and the act and state of pardon; all are expressed by words, all of which are derived from the same root and that root is δικαιος, which means just or right. Hence we have dikaiothentes, being justified; dikaiousune, the state of being upright; dikaiousune, justly, righteously; and dikaiosin, justification. This word has always reference to law, and is used to to express something in harmony with, or contrary to, law; as righteousness or unrighteousness. Now why such a word should be used to express the act and state of pardon, why the words justified and pardoned should be used interchangeably and synonymously ; why they should be used to express one and the same thing, as they certainly are by this apostle in the Scriptures now under consideration, seems at first sight unaccountable, for pardon has nothing to do with law, unless to set it at defiance ; at least this is true of pardon as usually understood. For instance, if one should take away my property by fraud, and I should pardon him fully and sincerely, the law would take no notice of my pardon, but would hold him guilty, and pronounce sentence just as readily after I had pardoned as before ; and this is alike true both of human and divine law. Why, then, is the guilty culprit said to be justified when God pardons him ? The fact is, God's pardon is like no other pardon, because it is in harmony with law ; and it is in harmony with law because, though the guilty is pardoned, the claims of the law are satisfied, are fully met, by the atonement. Though the sinner is pardoned there is no compromise with justice, its claims are fully met, it is satisfied, and the sinner now stands acquitted in the eye of the law. Hence the same apostle says, "There is, therefore, now, no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." And again, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect ? It is God that justifieth ? who is he that condemneth ? It is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." None but God Almighty can pardon thus, no other being can possibly do so ; and there was only one way in which he could do it, namely, by an atonement ; "For," says the same apostle, "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily, righteousness should have been by the law." Gal. iii. 21. But there was no such law, it is only by an atonement, according to the same authority that God could be "just," and at the same time justify or pardon. Rom. iii. 26. And while this could be done only by an atonement, that atonement could only be made in the way it was made; "there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin," says the same authority.

Now, then, let us sum up, and we shall find the amount to be this. The infant has the same qualification for baptism that Abraham had for circumcision, and that qualification is justification; and it receives baptism for the same reason that Abraham received circumcision, namely, because it is justified; and it receives baptism for the same purpose that Abraham received circumcision, namely, as the "sign" and "seal" of "righteousness," or "justification," previously received; and this right to and qualification for, baptism, it has from the same source, the very same source, from which Abraham received his right to and qualification for, circumcision. The only difference in the case is this: Abraham received justification conditionally, viz., by faith, but the infant receives justification unconditionally; Abraham's justification removed the condemnation brought upon him by his own transgressions, as well as the condemnation brought upon him by the original offence; while the infant's justification simply removes the condemnation brought upon it by the original apostasy, it having no act of its own; but the result of justification in each case is precisely the same, viz., this, the justified party in each case, is placed right with regard to the law; for, as we before observed, justification, or pardon, is a relative change, by which the relation of the justified party is changed with regard to the law, and consequently, with regard to the Lawgiver. In a word, all who are justified stand accepted before God the Judge, and in the eye of the law, so that there is no condemnation for the past. Hence infants being thus justified through the atonement, or, as Paul expresses it in the text quoted above, "through the righteousness of one," even Christ, they have the same right to the seal of the covenant, that believing adults have, the same right that Abraham had when he was justified and received the seal accordingly. Now as this qualification is received unconditionally, it follows, as we said before, that if one infant has it, all have it; and as this qualification is from Christ, and unconditional, it follows, too, that the parents have nothing to do either with qualifying or disqualifying them; as they have justification through Christ, and are thus qualified for baptism despite the sin of their first parents, so they have this qualification and right, despite the disobedience of their second parents; they are not qualified for baptism either by the faith or the holiness of their parents but by the atonement of Christ; if the parents have faith enough to present their children for baptism, that answers all purposes, so far as the children are concerned; and being thus presented, it is the duty of the minister of Christ to baptize them, and to enjoin it upon the parents to teach them to fear and worship that God to whom they have now consecrated them in holy baptism ; and to remind them that they are bound by the most sacred obligations, and now by consistency itself, to consecrate themselves to that God to whom they have consecrated their children. I have utterly failed to discover where any minister finds his authority for refusing baptism to any infant that may be presented to him by its parents for that purpose.

Finally, from the Scriptures here quoted, I think we are inevitably forced to the following conclusions. All infants have, through the atonement, unconditionally a right to, and a qualification for, baptism ; and that qualification is the very same qualification that Abraham had for circumcision, the very same that believing adults have for baptism, namely, justification ; and this justification, of course, does the very same thing for the infant that it does for the believing adult, namely, this, it puts it right with regard to the law, by removing the condemnatory sentence of the law, for this is the sole office of justification whether the party be an infant or an adult. Thus infants, through the atonement, sustain precisely the same relation to the law, and to God, the judge of all, that believing adults do ; the very same that Abraham did when he was justified, and that is a justified relation. Hence we see why it is that infants, as well as Abraham, “received the sign of circumcision,” which Paul says was “a seal of the righteousness,” or justification previously had. Now when we know, upon Scripture authority, that God commanded Abraham and infant children to be circumcised, and know, too, on the same authority, that circumcision was a seal of justification previously had, we thereby know that infants, as well as Abraham, were justified, or they would not have received the seal of justification, for that would be affixing the seal of justification to those who were not justified; which would not only be an unmeaning act, but a delusive act. Nay, it would be affixing the seal to an untruth!

The conclusion here reached secures the salvation of all infants, dying as such. Those who reject this conclusion are shut up to one of two conclusions, viz., that all infants are lost, or a certain part of them; and if they adopt the latter conclusion, they thereby represent God as damning infants whom he might have saved, for if he saved a part he certainly might have saved all, seeing all were alike incapable of offering resistance to the means employed for their salvation; and if they do not like this or the preceding conclusion, then they must adopt infant baptism; for if the infant is justified and fitted for heaven without its own act, it certainly may be, and is fitted for baptism without its own act. Thus we see that there is a close connection between infant baptism and infant salvation on the one hand; and an equally close connection between Antipedobaptism, and infant damnation on the other!

Again, Antipedobaptists "will baptize on profession" and on profession only. That is, they will baptize one who "indulges a hope that he has met with a change." But what does this mean? Why, it means just this, if it means anything to the purpose; he indulges a hope that he is justified, or pardoned. So that they have not even his word for it, but merely his hope; and upon this evidence they baptize him. But we have God's word for it that the infant is "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." And on this evidence we baptize it! This, then, is the difference; by so much as God's testimony is better than that of man's professed hope, by so much is our authority for baptizing the infant better than their authority for baptizing the adult! And in the same way we reach the conclusion, that no adult under heaven has as clear a claim to the rite of baptism as has the infant; because we have God's testimony in favor of the justification of the infant, while we have only man's testimony in favor of the justification of the adult, and that the testimony of the interested party, the party seeking baptism; and the party judging in the case is also interested, being under the influence of a desire to make accessions to his church and party! Nor does the preponderance in our favor stop here, for we not only have God's testimony in favor of the infant's qualification for baptism, but we have his command to apply to the infant the very same seal that he commanded to be applied to the adult, viz., the seal of the covenant, the seal of justification obtained through the atonement; which justification is obtained by the adult conditionally, and by the infant unconditionally. It follows that he who will have better authority for anything that he does than we have for baptizing the infant, must have better than the testimony and the command of the Almighty! Truly they are seriously defective in Bible knowledge who exclude infants from Christian baptism; and I do not hesitate to say, that Antipedobaptism originated in an ignorance of, and is at variance with, some of the first and most glorious principles of the Christian system; and upon that ignorance it is that it depends principally for its propagation; and it is high time that this error and the ignorance of which it is the offspring should be driven out of Christendom! Infants are redeemed. Jesus claims them all as the purchase of his blood, and says, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." And every minister of Jesus should unite with Jesus in rebuking those who forbid their being brought to Jesus, and should iterate and reiterate the words of Jesus, saying, "Forbid them not." And they should unite with Paul in uttering that glorious truth upon which we have been commenting, and upon which we delight to dwell; "Therefore, as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." These truths should be uttered by Zion's watchmen joyously and incessantly; and should come pealing like thunder from every part of Zion's walls. And they should be taken up by the inhabitants of Zion and uttered with such rapturous joy that their voices commingling should be as the sound of many waters; then should the dolorous, owl-like cry of the Antipedobaptist be heard no more!

If by the sin of our first parents their posterity were excluded from the Kingdom of God without their own act, and are not restored by the righteousness of Christ without their own act, it will follow that Adam did more to destroy than Christ did to save, and if so, Paul uttered an untruth when he said, "Where sin abounded grace did much more abound." But as we cannot adopt either of these conclusions, we are forced, in this way also, to adopt the conclusion which we claim to have established, viz., that the condemnation which came by Adam's sin, is removed by the justification which came by Christ's righteousness; and the parties who by that condemnation were excluded from God's Kingdom, and, consequently, from eternal life, by a non-existence, are by this justification restored thereto. And if they are justified and restored to God's Kingdom through the atonement, we may well say in the language of Peter, "Can any forbid water that these should not be baptized?" for justification received without faith qualifies for circumcision or for baptism just as much as a justification received by faith; for justification is the same whether received conditionally or unconditionally.

In the light of these teachings we are prepared, I trust, to see more clearly, and to appreciate more fully, the following blessed and altogether glorious words of our Almighty Savior! "And they brought young children to him that he should touch them; and his disciples rebuked those that brought them. But when Jesus saw it he was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. And he took them in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them."—Mark x. 13-17.

Now, with this passage before us, we will call attention to and make a few remarks upon the following particulars, which may be considered the more prominent features of the passage. It will be remembered that Anabaptists speak of "unconscious babes," as though neither God nor man could do anything for them; but the following particulars convey a very different idea.

The first particular to which we call attention is this: infants are susceptible of the divine blessing, for we are told that "Jesus took them in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them." I say infants, for Luke calls these "little children" infants.

Now, let us not look upon all this as mere form; when "the Lord of life and glory" pronounces blessing upon the infant that is brought to him by the parent's hands, and by the parent's heart, his utterances are not mere unmeaning words; His blessing means something! Let it be remembered, too, that it is by His righteousness that "the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life," and that "the blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich," and infants have that blessing. Yes, they have it, for we have heard "the Lord of life and glory" pronounce his blessing upon them, even upon the infants that were brought unto Him. Who, then, would refuse to bring their infant children to this "Lord of life and glory?" and when parents bring their infant children unto Him, who will dare to "forbid them?" We know none in Christendom who would do so but Antipedobaptists! Let it be remembered, too, that if one infant is capable or susceptible of receiving "the blessing of the LORD," all are; for all infants are alike incapable of offering resistance to the Divine will. Oh, let not parents or ministers resist that will, by doing what those did with whom Jesus was "much displeased;" and remember, he is as much displeased with that act now as he was then. But rather than admit that Jesus is capable of blessing the soul of an infant, Antipedobaptists have invented the marvelous idea that the infants here spoken of were brought to Jesus to have some bodily disease healed! By this invention they represent the disciples as forbidding their being brought for this purpose, a thing they never did, for it was customary to bring all manner of sick persons to Jesus; and they represent Jesus as insisting that diseased infants should be brought to him for the purpose of being healed, and as giving this reason, "for of such is the Kingdom of God." Certainly, this objection does not deserve further notice.

We next call attention to the phrase, "Of such is the Kingdom of God." Now if we understand this phrase, "Kingdom of God," or, as St. Matthew expresses it, "Kingdom of Heaven," to mean the future home of God's people, then these words of Jesus assure us that infants are heirs of that Kingdom with all those adults whose names are written in heaven. But if we are to understand by this phrase, the Church of God upon the earth, then we are taught to recognize infants as properly constituted members of that Church, which they certainly were under both the patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations; and surely the perfected Gospel dispensation will not exclude from their place in the Church those infants whom the less perfect dispensations received into that place. And if we understand Jesus to teach us, as we certainly must, that infants are, through the atonement, members of the Heavenly Kingdom, then certainly we cannot exclude them from the earthly kingdom. Hence, whatever way we understand the phrase we must understand our blessed Lord as placing infants in his Kingdom, which "is not of this world." And if we understand him as teaching that adults who constitute his Kingdom must resemble little children, as some Antipedobaptists would interpret the words "of such," certainly their cause will gain nothing by it, for by this interpretation they make infants model Christians! And if they are model Christians, we desire to know upon what ground they refuse to baptize them!

"A more correct translation," says Mr. Watson, on the place, "would be, For to such belongeth the Kingdom of God."

We may now glance at the words, "Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein." Now if we take the ground that infants do not receive, do not share in the Kingdom of God, how could our blessed Lord teach, as he here does, that we must all receive it as they do? And unless we attribute this absurdity to our Lord, we must understand him as teaching that infants do receive the Kingdom, do belong to the Kingdom of God. But how do infants receive the Kingdom of God? Like a pharisee, by fasting twice in the week, and paying tithe of all that they possess? Certainly not. How then do they receive it? By works of righteousness which they have done? By no means; the helpless infant has neither tithe nor works of any kind. How, then, do they receive it? By merit of any kind? No, not by merit of any kind. How, then, do they receive it? Paul tells us, in the words which we have quoted several times already, they receive it as a "free gift;" they were "justified freely by his grace;" "the free gift came upon all unto justification of life." And just so every child of man must receive it, or not at all. Only in the case of adults who are accountable for actions of their own, and must now be treated as moral agents, faith is required as a condition. But still they receive the Kingdom of God as a "free gift." Still it is by grace they are saved through faith, and that not of themselves; "it is the gift of God." Here we are again taught that infants and believing adults receive the same kingdom, and both receive it as a "free gift," and for precisely the same reason each is entitled to the seal of the covenant, the seal of justification already received as a "free gift," through the atonement. How, then, dare any one rebuke those who bring their beloved infants to Jesus in holy baptism, seeing they are his by redemption, his by justification, as truly as are believing adults? For those who did so before Jesus uttered the above words, there might be some excuse; but for those who do so in defiance of these teachings and reproofs of Jesus, it is difficult, very difficult, if at all possible, to find any excuse. Let them remember, however, that with such conduct "Jesus was much displeased," and let all who are rebuked by them for bringing their children to Jesus, treat their rebukes as Jesus did.

In speaking of the qualification of infants for baptism, it will be seen that we did not find that qualification in the goodness of their moral nature. Our teachings here are not Pelagian, nor are they in the least tainted with Pelagianism. It is quite certain that infants come into the world with a nature morally depraved. The word of God is neither equivocal nor obscure on that point. Man is made to declare that fact with his own lips, in these words: "I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me." "The wicked are estranged from the womb." God has not told us when or how he rectifies the moral nature of the infant. Hence it were folly for man to undertake to tell what God has not told. But he has told us that the condemnation brought upon it by the apostasy of the first parents is removed by an unconditional justification vouchsafed through the atonement. And this relative change which sets it right with regard to the law, is its qualification for baptism. Although it is not for us to say, nor does our argument require us to say, why God has not spoken as clearly with regard to the positive, as he has with regard to the relative change, we may observe, that the relative change could take place before the child had a positive existence, but the positive change could not. And it is proper to observe, too, that when adults are justified their moral nature is very far from being perfectly pure; they are not then cleansed from all the natural uncleanness, they are not sanctified wholly. Why this is so, God has not told us; the fact, however, we must submit to in each case. It is enough for us to know that if God calls away that infant, or that newly justified adult, he will make each meet for an inheritance among the saints in light, for "without holiness no one shall see the Lord." But why, or to what extent the further work is left conditional, we cannot tell. We have gone as far as facts and revelation guide us.

CHAPTER XV.

The Argument from Apostolic practice—The Apostles baptized the Believing Father and his House—Remarks on the Greek words Oikos and Oikia—Taylor is quoted—Some further remarks with regard to the Origin and History of the Anabaptists.

We will now glance at the Apostolic practice as recorded in the New Testament; from which we learn that the Apostles not only baptized the head of the house, when converted, but the family also. Hence, when the jailer believed, we are told that "He was baptized, he and all his straightway." In like manner, we are told when Lydia believed, "She was baptized, and her household." And St. Paul says: "I baptized also the house of Stephanus."

But in all these and many other families similarly spoken of in the New Testament, the Antipedobaptists can find no children; they will have it that all these families were as childless as are their own churches! Just as soon as the sacred writers tell us of a man that was baptized, "he and all his," they are ready to say, "write this man childless!" But, as Mr. Watson says, "The great difficulty with Baptists is to make a house for Lydia without any children at all, young or old." And I do not know but they think they have succeeded admirably, when they tell us about certain journeymen dyers, whom they conjecture were "employed in preparing the purple she sold!" Of these journeymen, however, no mortal ever heard anything, but what the Baptists tell us; and, what is still worse, the Baptists themselves never heard of such men; it is all made up! And it only tends, as Mr. Watson further observes, "to mark more strikingly the helplessness of the attempt to torture this passage in favor of an opinion."

As the objections of the Antipedobaptists to what has been said with regard to family baptisms by other writers have been frequently and fully answered; and as it is, and has been, our purpose not to follow the beaten track, we will simply say, just here, that it was Lydia and her oikos that was baptized, not Lydia and her journeymen dyers. And when she was baptized, and her oikos, she besought the Apostles, saying, "If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my oikon." It was not her oikia, but her oikos, that was baptized! Our opponents will please look into their Greek Testaments and see if this is not so. We beg to remind them, too, that no man speaking the Greek language, especially if he were a scholar, as Luke was, would tell us of the baptism of Lydia and her oikos, when he meant Lydia and her journeymen dyers! Moreover, while the sacred historian gives us a minute account of Lydia's conversion, he does not say a word about the conversion of her journeymen dyers! In short, all this talk about Lydia's journeymen dyers is as ridiculous as it is gratuitous. Nor does the sacred historian say a word about the conversion of Lydia's oikos; he simply tells us that, being converted, "she was baptized and her oikos;" for, there being no Antipedobaptists in those days, it was entirely unnecessary to say more; seeing it was the well-known and divinely established usage to extend the initiatory rite to the children of the initiated parent. But no such privilege belonged to the employes of the believer, simply because their employer was a believer; and if Lydia's hired men had been converted, Luke would have told us of their conversion when he told us of their baptism, just as he told us of the conversion of Lydia when he told us of her baptism. But Luke has simply told us of the conversion of Lydia and of her baptism, and of the baptism of her oikos in consequence. And every Christian in those days, when told of Lydia's conversion and baptism, knew why her oikos were baptized, just as a Jew knew why the oikos of a Jew were circumcised. Every Jew knew that Ishmael was circumcised when his father Abraham was, though the former was then "thirteen years old." And it was equally well known that Isaac was circumcised when "eight days old." And this practice continued among all the worshipers of the true God from that time till baptism took the place of circumcision. Here, then, we have this fact, viz.: that circumcision was, by divine command, extended to the children of believing parents from the age of eight days to that of thirteen years, without any reference to their own act! Now, when Lydia received the seal of the covenant, her children, her oikos, also received it, just as did the oikos of Abraham after their father received it.

Here is the record, Gen. xvii. 26: "In the self-same day was Abraham circumcised and Ishmael, his son;" and if Abraham had had other children, of course they, too, would have received the seal of the covenant the self-same day that Abraham and Ishmael did. Now in precisely the same way it was, and for the same reason, that the oikos of Lydia received the seal the self-same day that their mother did. Agreeably to this exactly, are the teachings of Paul when he says the children are holy, that is, sanctified or consecrated to God in baptism even where one of the parents is a believer; so that we have both his teaching and practice for baptizing children, even where only one of the parents is a believer, and brings her children with her. These are facts that bid defiance to all that can be said by the advocates of mere novelty!

Although what is here said is, we believe, a sufficient explanation and defence of all the family baptisms referred to, we will, nevertheless, glance at the baptism of the jailer's family, as it is recorded in Acts xvi., because we think a more critical examination of the record will elicit information not obtained without a reference to the original.

If you will look into your Greek Testament, you will find that the reading is as follows: Verse 30: "Sirs, what must I do to be saved? And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved, and thy oikos. And they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his oikia. And he took them the same hour of the night and washed their stripes; and was baptized, he and all his," not all the oikia, but "all his." "And when he had brought them into his oikon, he set meat before them, and rejoiced, believing in God with all his oikon."

Now, having before us this brief and clear exhibit of the sacred narrative, in which every one can see the words as they are varied in the original, but not in the common text, we call attention to the following particulars: First, the promise and its condition read thus: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved, and thy oikos." Second, "they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his oikia," not oikos, you will observe. Third, he did believe, "and was baptized, he and all his." Mark, it is not said that he and all his oikia were baptized, but "he and all his." The promise was to him and his oikos, children; the word was preached to him and to all that were in his oikia, not only to him, but to all his household, all who were present. But we are not told that any believed except the jailer, nor are we told that any were baptized save "he and all his." His children were baptized with him, precisely as Paul had promised; but the others present, and not believing, though the word was preached to them, had no such privilege; they were not baptized, as were "he and all his." Now, he brought them into his oikon and "set meat before them, and rejoiced, believing in God with all his oikon." Having obtained salvation, and he and his family being baptized, he prepared this eucharistic feast, and "rejoiced with all his house, believing in God." Egalliasato panoiki pepisteukos to Theo. Believing in God as he did, or having believed, he rejoiced with his house, or, as some express it, at the head of his house. Panoiki is differently rendered, but the whole of the 34th verse, taken together, is plain enough; the whole house partook of his joy and he of theirs; but the believing is peculiarly predicated of him.

But I desire more especially to call attention to the words oikos and oikia. The promise was to the former, the preaching to the latter, and the baptism was administered to him and all his. These are the facts as recorded.

Mr. Taylor, in his admirable work on Baptism, entitled "Facts and Evidences," says, p. 90: "When the Philippian jailer enquired, 'What must I do to be saved?' the apostle answered, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved and thy house.' The oikia, servants of the jailor, heard the Word; but we do not read that one of the oikia was baptized, saved, but this we do read of the jailor, and of all his house; which is exactly what the apostle foretold." It will be seen that Mr. Taylor marks the same distinction between the words oikos and oikia that we have pointed out above. Again, on p. 60, speaking of the baptism of Stephanus, he says: "Scripture says his family was baptized; I, therefore, believe that fact—Scripture says nothing of the baptism of his household, I, therefore, do not believe it. But I will believe it whenever a passage of Scripture shall be produced in which HOUSEHOLD, oikia, is connected with baptism." Here this ripe scholar, after the most careful investigation, tells us that he has failed to find a single instance on record where a man and his oikia, household, are said to have been baptized; but he does find it recorded that Lydia and her oikos were baptized, and that the jailer and his oikos were baptized; but although we are told that the apostle preached the Word to the jailer's oikia we are not told that his oikia were baptized. The promise was to him and his children, oikos, and when he believed he and his were baptized according to promise!

Following the above remarks, Mr. Taylor proceeds thus: "The mischance that our translators should have used the terms house and household interchangeably, though Scripture preserves the distinction, is glaring respecting the family of Onesiphorus, 2 Timothy i. 16, and iv. 19. The Greek word in one text is rendered 'house,' and in the other 'household,' notwithstanding the same persons are intended. Our translators also have used one word, household, to express both the family and household of Stephanus, though Scripture uses two words in order to make the distinction, and certainly does not mean the same persons. This has produced confusion, and various weak and inconsistent arguments." To this fact we have called attention in the narrative of the jailer's conversion and baptism, where we have shown that the sacred historian has used the words oikos and oikia, both of which are rendered house, though the historian predicates of the one what he does not of the other.

So convinced is Mr. Taylor of the truthfulness and the importance of this distinction, and of the fixedness of the meaning of the word oikos, both in the Old and New Testaments, that he wholly rests his argument in favor of Infant Baptism upon this single point. Hence, on page 14, he says: "The argument is brought to this point: the Old Testament writers use the term House in the sense of family, with a special reference to INFANTS; the New Testament writers use the term House exactly in the same sense as the Old Testament writers; therefore, when the New Testament writers say that they baptized houses, they mean to say that they baptized INFANTS." After the most laborious investigation, and after quoting numerous texts of Scripture, both from the Old and New Testaments, and after producing a great variety of arguments, such as none but a scholar and a thinker could produce, and all to establish the above proposition, he reaches such conclusions as the following, which I find upon page 89: "Being myself convinced that the apostles practiced infant baptism, and that the evangelist meant to tell us so, I affirm that the natural import of the term oikos, family, includes children of all ages. In proof, I offer fifty examples; if fifty are not sufficient, I offer a hundred; if a hundred are not sufficient, two hundred; if two hundred are not sufficient, four hundred. I affirm that oikos VERY OFTEN expresses the presence of infants; of this I offer fifty examples, and if we admit classical instances, fifty more. Euripides alone affords half the number, though he frequently uses domos instead of oikos. More than three hundred instances have been examined which have proved perfectly satisfactory." He now goes on to show that when the sacred writers tell us of the baptism of a man and his oikos, they thereby convey to us the idea of infant baptism more undeniably than they could, perhaps, in any other way. In proof of this he quotes the following facts, thus: "What terms could the evangelists have used to satisfy us of the apostolic practice of infant baptism? Had they said, 'We baptize infants;' Origin says this, and Baptists immediately exclaim, 'Metaphorical infants! metaphorical infants!' Had they said, 'We baptize children,' as the apostles Paul and John, and Clement of Alexandria say, they answer, 'Metaphorical children!'" Hence he concludes that when the sacred writers use the word oikos as they have done, they thereby put the fact of infant baptism more effectually beyond the possibility of evasion than they would have done if they had only used the word infants; for the word family, or oikos, must include infants and little ones; and we may more plausibly talk about metaphorical infants, or children, than we could about metaphorical families! So true it is that the Bible is right not only as to the ideas, which it conveys to us, but also as to the words which it employs for that purpose. The truth is, no words could be used that would prevent certain people from rejecting the right and embracing the wrong. Some people will be wrong anyhow!

After quoting many texts in the Old Testament, the same author quotes the following: Ruth iv. 11, 13: "The LORD make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel and like Lea, which two did build the house of Israel: and do thou worthily in Ephratah: and be famous in Bethlehem: and let thine house be like the house of Pharez, whom Tamar bare unto Judah, of the seed which the Lord shall give thee of this young woman." "It is not possible," continues our author, "by any form of words whatever, to express INFANTS more decidedly than by these applications of the term HOUSE: and if there were no other text in the Old Testament, this last alone is sufficient to establish the proposition that the term house in the Old Testament language MUST mean an infant. The building up of the house of Israel is infant child-bearing. Thy HOUSE—the 'SEED which the Lord SHALL GIVE THEE of this young woman' MUST mean an infant. This is the national and acknowledged language used by 'all the people that were in the gate,' not by the vulgar only, but by those well instructed; by the elders." Thus it is that this writer establishes the fact, viz.: that this word oikos, house, conveys the idea of infants, or children, both in the Old and New Testaments. The Spirit that inspired and guided the writers of the Old Testament to use this word for the purpose of conveying this idea, also inspired and guided the New Testament writers to use it for the same purpose. Now, seeing this word had this fixed and universally understood meaning among that people for some two thousand years, was it possible for them to misunderstand one of their own writers when he told them that he baptized the jailer and his oikos, Lydia and her oikos, Stephanus and his oikos? I say, was it possible for them to understand him otherwise than that he baptized the man and his children, or the woman and her children, as the case might be? And, waiving the consideration of inspiration, we ask, was it possible for a Jewish writer to tell this people that he baptized a man and his house, if he did not mean a man and his children, especially infants?

And the supposition becomes the more impossible, when it is remembered not only that his oikos meant his children, but that it was the divinely appointed usage of that people, and had been so for some two thousand years, to apply the seal to the children when it was applied to the parent. The fact is, it seems impossible for any one that is not shamefully ignorant of the Bible and history, to doubt the meaning of the historic records of the New Testament with regard to the baptism of certain individuals and their families.

After filling nearly one hundred pages with "facts and evidences" in favor of infant baptism, this writer closes his admirable work with the following remarks, which we think may be useful just here :

"I close these researches upon the SUBJECT OF CHRISTIAN BAPTISM with two inferences.

"1. The Christian Church in the North, in the South, in the East, and in the West, NEVER DID REFUSE BAPTISM TO INFANTS. Are the Baptists, then, wiser than all the world? than all the faithful men of apostolic ages, and than all their contemporaries? Is it likely that they alone, of all the millions of Christians of every period and nation, in spite of these 'FACTS AND EVIDENCES,' should be the only persons who have elicited Scriptural truth?

"2. In all Christian Churches, baptism is a consecration to the Trinity! Not one uses any form of words—the Baptists themselves do not use any form of words in the administration of baptism, allusive to the burial of the person baptized, as they say Christ was buried. Had our Lord intended such allusion, He would have said so.....I adhere to the initiatory words of Christ as the best and greatest authority on the subject; for it is very extraordinary that in a religion having but two rites, they should both point at the same thing. The death of the Savior is clearly the primary and direct purport of the Lord's Supper. Is it likely or credible that the primary and direct purport of baptism should also be the death of the Savior? But if in the initiatory rite there be a commemoration of the interposing Deity, and in the Lord's Supper a commemoration of the interposing humanity—if for this reason consecration to the Deity is sufficient by one act, and ought not to be repeated, while devotedness to Jesus, as Lord of all, is frequently renewed, and to be repeated continually, then there is between the two rites that distinction which was evidently intended, and which it well becomes all professors of our common faith to retain to the latest generation."

It is a remarkable, and a very telling fact, that those scholars who have been most thorough in their investigations on the subject of baptism have, as the result of their investigations, been most confident in their conclusions. Hence the editor of Calmet's Dictionary, like Baxter and many others, has utterly failed to find anything clearly in favor of Anabaptist notions, while his vast accumulation of FACTS and EVIDENCES are directly and irreconcilably opposed to them. As an antiquarian he searches ancient churches, catacombs, and other places, and there finds monuments of the artistic skill, and of the piety, sentiments and practice of the ancient Christians; monuments which have stood there from primitive times, bearing their unchangeable and unmistakable testimony both as to the mode and subjects of baptism during the early and following ages of the Christian Church, and in every instance they testify that Anabaptist notions are novelties! These ancient works of art represent baptism as being administered by pouring; and the ancient inscriptions testify to the baptism of children, after this manner: "To Aristus who lived eight months: NEWLY BAPTIZED, he went off the first of the nones of June, A. D. 389: Timasius and Promotorus being Consuls." The original is in Latin, and this is the translation which our author gives us. This is only one out of the many similar inscriptions which he furnishes. As a philologist he searches with equal diligence, and discovers that the words which refer to the subject in hand were fixed and unmistakable in their meaning, and that they bear an equally decisive and unequivocal testimony against the same novelties; and that their testimony in favor of the views here contended for is not less decisive and unequivocal. And, finally, as a student of history, he discovers that "the Christian Churches in the North, in the South, in the East, and in the West, NEVER DID REFUSE BAPTISM TO INFANTS!" And finding that neither he nor any other man, ancient or modern, could discover what Antipedobaptists claim to have discovered, he asks: "Is it likely that they alone, of all the millions of Christians of every period and nation, in spite of these FACTS and EVIDENCES, should be the only persons who have elicited Scripture truth!" But startling as is this question, it will become still more startling if put in this form, which is really the proper form: "Is it likely that the fanatics of Germany, such as Thomas Munzer, Conrad Grebel, John Matthias, and John Boccold, should discover what all the learned, the wise, and the good, both ancient and modern, have failed to discover?" This is really the question; for to the parties here mentioned we trace the Antipedobaptist notions, and beyond these parties we find them not. If the advocates of these notions can find them prior to these fanatics, let them tell us when, and where!

But lest any should impose upon their neighbors by bold assertion instead of argument, which is not at all an unfrequent occurrence, we will here furnish a few of the facts of history.

To escape the storm which was now driving down with terrible fury from the "seven mountains upon which the woman sitteth," Luther was carried to the ancient Castle of Wartburg, where he remained for some twelve months. During his stay there the Reformation progressed, but there arose a new set of reformers claiming to be prophets, and like certain reformers in olden times boasting great things. The good Elector of Saxony being both alarmed and puzzled, wrote Luther. The great Reformer soon comprehended the matter, and replied thus: "Your Electoral Grace has been accustomed for many years to seek for relics in every country. God has granted your desires, and has sent you, without expense or trouble, a complete cross, with nails, lances, and scourges.....grace and prosperity to the new relic! ..... Let your Highness only without fear extend your arms, and allow the nails to pierce the flesh!

..... I have always expected that Satan would send us this plague." This plague first appeared in the little town of Zwickau. The following account of it is from D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation, 1846. W. R. McPhun, Glasgow. Page 579 :

"There dwelt in this town some men who, excited by the manifestation of the great events which then agitated the public mind in Christendom, aspired to the possession of direct revelations from the Divine Being, instead of seeking with simplicity the sanctification of the heart, and who pretended that they were called to complete the Reformation of which Luther had weakly sketched the design. 'For what good purpose is it,' said they, 'to attach one's self so exclusively to the Bible? The Bible! Always the Bible! Can the Bible speak to us? Is it not insufficient for our instruction? If God had wished to instruct us by means of a book, would he not have sent us a Bible from heaven? It is by the Spirit alone that we can be enlightened. God himself thus speaks to us. God himself reveals to us what we ought to do and what we ought to say.' A simple cloth manufacturer named Nicolas Stork, declared that the Angel Gabriel had appeared to him during the night, and that, after having communicated many things which he could not yet reveal, the angel had said: 'Thou thyself shalt sit upon my throne.' One of the former students at Wittemberg, called Mark Stubner, united himself to Stork, and immediately abandoned his studies; because, as he said, he received directly from God the gift of interpreting the Holy Scriptures. Mark Thomas, another cloth manufacturer, also joined the party; while a new adept, Thomas Munzer, a man of a fantastic disposition, imparted a regular organization to the body of this new sect. Stork, wishing to follow the example of Christ, chose from among his adherents twelve apostles and seventy-two disciples." After telling us somewhat of their prophesyings and of their doings, our historian thus proceeds: "Nicolas Haussman, to whom Luther bore this elegant testimony—'That which we teach he does'—was then the pastor of Zwickau. This worthy man did not allow himself to be carried away by the assumptions of these false prophets. He opposed the innovations which Stork and his adherents were anxious to introduce, and the two deacons of the church acted in unison with their pastor..... They formed regular organizations, wherein destructive doctrines were acknowledged, and the minds of the people became highly excited." The civil authorities interfering, these fanatics met with an opposition which checked their progress, and Nicolas Stork, Mark Thomas, and Mark Stubner, started for Wittemberg.

"They arrived in this celebrated town," continues our historian, "on the 27th of December, 1521. Stork marched first, imitating the step and bearing of a common soldier, while Thomas and Stubner followed behind him. The troubles which reigned in Wittemberg favored the designs of these strangers. The youths of the academy, and the citizens, at the time in a state of much agitation, composed, as it were, a soil prepared for the operations of the new prophets. Hence, believing themselves sure of their support, they immediately waited upon the professors of the university, in order to obtain their concurrence. 'We are,' said the strangers, 'sent from God to give instruction to the people. We hold familiar conversation with the Lord, and we are acquainted with the events that are to come to pass: in a word, we are apostles and prophets, and we appeal, in this matter, to Doctor Luther.' This singular language amazed the doctors of the university. 'Who has ordained you to preach?' enquired Melancthon of Stubner, his former pupil, whom he received into his house: 'Our Lord God.' 'Have you written any books?' 'Our Lord God has forbidden me to do so.' Melancthon was thunderstruck; equally amazed and alarmed..... Stork, whose character was restless, very soon quitted the town of Wittemberg, but Stubner remained there. Animated with an ardent desire of proselytism, he visited every district of the town, speaking sometimes to one person, sometimes to another [their children but too closely adhere to the practice of their ancestors], and several of his hearers acknowledged him as a prophet sent from God. He addressed himself particularly to a Swabian named Cellarius, a friend of Melancthon, who kept a school wherein he gave instructions in letters to a great number of young people, and who very soon fully recognized the mission of the new prophets.

"Melancthon became more and more uncertain and disquieted in his mind. It was not so much the visions of the prophets from Zwickau which disturbed his imagination, as the new doctrine they professed upon the sacrament of baptism." Mark, it was A NEW DOCTRINE! What it was we shall see pretty soon.

“Circumstances became more and more serious at Wittemberg. Carlstadt rejected several of the doctrines professed by the new prophets, and in particular their Anabaptism.” But things grew worse and worse, and the friends of the Reformation were now more afraid of these fanatical Anabaptists than they were of Rome itself; for the enemies of the truth were shrewd enough to charge their fanatical doings and their wild insubordination to Luther and his followers, in a word, to the Reformation.

Meantime many communications reached Luther in the Castle of Wartburg, and he was evidently well convinced both as to the nature and danger of the work that was going on. “I throw myself,” he exclaimed, “in the dust while creeping towards the grace of the Eternal, and I beseech him to allow his name to be still connected with this work, and that if something impure has mingled in its operations, he will remember that I am a weak and sinful man.” Finally, “upon the 3d of March, he rose with the resolution to quit the Castle of Wartburg forever. He bade adieu to those ancient towers and dark forests; and issued forth beyond those walls behind which neither the excommunications of Leo X. nor the sword of Charles V. were able to restrain him.”

As Luther went to Worms so he returned to Wittemberg, determined to enter though there were in it as many devils as there were tiles upon the housetops! He entered! and soon the announcement, “Luther is come!” “Luther is come!” flew through the place like flashes of lightning, and were felt like the electric shock. All at once, too, all the Anabaptist prophets were missing, Cellarius only excepted. Eight sermons from Luther produced wonderful effects. "At the command of Luther," says D'Aubigne, p. 596, "objections vanished, tumult was appeased, sedition ceased to vociferate her clamor, and the citizens of Wittenberg resumed the tranquil occupations of life." . . . . "Nevertheless, Stubner, having been informed that the sheep of his flock had dispersed, returned speedily to his old haunts. Those who had remained constant to 'the celestial prediction,' surrounded their master, recounted to him the substance of Luther's discourses, and impatiently inquired of him what course they ought in consequence to pursue."

Stubner and Cellarius were, or pretended to be, confident that they could defend their claims before Luther, and demanded an interview. Their request was granted, and the result was as might be expected. The following is a brief sketch of the conference, as recorded by D'Aubigne on p. 597. "Stubner was allowed to speak first. He explained how he wished to renew the Church and to change the world. Luther listened to his harangue with great calmness. At last, with great gravity, he replied, 'Nothing of what you have said is founded upon the Holy Scriptures, all your affirmations are made up of fables.' When these words were uttered, Cellarius was unable longer to restrain his fury. He commenced to speak; he made violent gestures; stamped with his feet, and struck with his hand the table that stood before him. He worked himself into a passion, and exclaimed it was shameful to dare in this manner to speak to a man of God. Then Luther quietly added, ‘St. Paul declares that the proofs of his apostleship have appeared through the working of wonders, prove yours by the performance of miracles.’ ‘We will do so,’ responded the prophets. ‘The God I adore,’ said Luther, ‘shall well know how to hold your gods in check.’ Stubner, who had preserved a larger portion of self-possession, fixing at this moment his eyes upon the Reformer, said, with the air of one inspired, ‘Martin Luther, I am about to declare to you the thoughts which are now passing in your soul! . . . you begin to believe that my doctrine is true.’ Luther, having for a few moments remained silent, replied, ‘God reprove thee, Satan.’ . . . At these words all the prophets became furious. ‘The Spirit, the Spirit!’ they bellowed out. Luther, adopting, with a cold tone of disdain, the cutting familiar language peculiar to himself, said, ‘I have hit your Spirit on the snout.’ The clamor now increased two-fold, and Cellarius especially distinguished himself by his ravings. He became frantic, he shook and foamed at the mouth. No one could at this time be heard in the chamber of the conference. At last the three prophets abandoned the place, and on the same day quitted the city of Wittemberg.” Thus it was that the novelties of the fanatical Anabaptists were met by the great Reformer, and thus it was that the new prophets were routed, at least for the present. But though they have fled from Wittemberg they have not abandoned their errors or ceased to propagate them. We must, therefore, follow them a little further.

On p. 741, our historian gives us the following account of their further proceedings:

“The fanaticism of the Anabaptists, extinguished in Germany at the time of Luther’s return to Wittenberg, re-appeared with increased strength in Switzerland, and it threatened to overthrow the edifice which Zwingli, Haller and Ecolampade had reared upon the foundation of the word of God. Thomas Munzer, when forced to leave Saxony in the year 1521, had retreated to the very frontiers of Switzerland. Conrad Grebel, whose restless and ardent disposition we have already had occasion to describe, was bound in ties of amity with Munzer as well as Felix Mantz, the son of a canon, and some other citizens of the town of Zurich; while Grebel had likewise endeavored to gain the support of Zwingli. In vain had this Swiss reformer advanced in that direction further than Luther; for he now beheld a party eager to outstrip the progress he had made. ‘Let us form,’ said Grebel to Zwingli, ‘a company of true believers; because it is to them alone the promise belongs; and let us establish a Church wherein sin shall not be allowed to enter.’ ‘It is impossible,’ replied Zwingli, ‘to form a heaven upon earth; and Christ has taught us that we must allow the tares to grow along with the wheat.’ Grebel, being frustrated in his attempts with the reformer, longed to make an appeal to the people. ‘The whole community of Zurich,’ said he, ‘must, with sovereign power, decide upon the affairs of faith.’ But Zwingli feared the influence these radical enthusiasts might exercise upon the minds of a numerous assembly.”

Three things should be noticed, just here, in the doings of these fanatics. First, while by proselyting and in other ways they are endeavoring to tear the church to pieces, they nevertheless cry out loudly for union ! Second, they at the same time declare that the church is all wrong, they only are right, and are going to have a church "wherein sin shall not be allowed to enter." Third, they flatter the people, cry out for their rights, and declare that "the whole community must with sovereign power decide upon the affairs of faith." We, too, have seen this game played: union has been loudly called for, while at the same time the work of proselyting has been carried on, and our Church represented as no church, and our baptism as no baptism; and, as of old, the people have been appealed to and flattered! But this game did not succeed with Luther and Zwingle; the German and Swiss reformers were not to be taken in this way; for though the "Swiss reformer advanced in that direction further than Luther," he soon discovered his mistake, and it was well he did, for the character and designs of the Anabaptist prophets soon became painfully apparent, as the following extracts from the same history will show:

"Repulsed by Zwingle, Grebel turned his attention elsewhere. Rubli, the ancient pastor of Basil, Brodtlein, the pastor of Zollekon, and likewise Herzer, received his advances with eagerness. They resolved to form an independent community in the center of the grand community, a church in the middle of the church. A NEW BAPTISM was fixed upon as the means of gathering together their congregation, composed exclusively of true believers. 'The baptism of infants,' said they, 'is a horrible abomination, a manifest impiety, invented by the evil spirit and Nicholas II. the Pope of Rome.' The council of Zurich, alarmed at the prospect of these proceedings, issued an order for the observance of a public discussion ; and the Anabaptists, still refusing to forsake their errors, some people of Zurich belonging to their sect were cast into prison, while a few strangers were banished from the district. But this persecution only served to augment the fervor of these enthusiasts.".... "Some of their number, begirt with cords or willow wands, walked through the streets, exclaiming, 'in a few days Zurich shall be destroyed. Woe to you, Zurich ! woe woe !' Many of them gave vent to expressions of blasphemy. 'Baptism,' said they, 'is the bathing of a dog, there is no more use in baptizing an infant than in baptizing a cat.' Simple people were thrown into a state of commotion and dread. Fourteen men, and among their number Felix Mantz, in company with seven women, were taken into custody, in spite of the intercession of Zwingli, and condemned to live upon bread and water in the tower of the heretics. At the end of fifteen days' confinement, they succeeded in raising some planks during the night, and, with the assistance of each other, they effected their escape. 'An angel,' they said, 'had opened the prison and procured their deliverance.' A monk who had fled from his convent, George Jacobade Coire, surnamed Blaurock, because he always wore, as would appear, a blue habit, joined the newly-formed sect, and was, on account of his natural eloquence, denominated the second St. Paul. This bold monk went about from place to place, obliging people to receive the token of his baptism by means of his overheated appeals. On a certain Sunday, in Zollekon, at the moment when the deacon was delivering his sermon, the impetuous Anabaptist interrupted the speaker by exclaiming in a voice of thunder, 'It is written my house is a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves,' then raising a stick he carried in his hand, he struck with it on the ground four violent blows, exclaiming, 'I am the door, he who will enter through me shall find food. I am the good shepherd. My body I give up to prison; my life I give up to the sword, to the funeral pile or to the wheel. I am the commencement of baptism and of the bread of the Lord.'"

"But Zwingle offering a stern opposition to the torrent of Anabaptism in Zurich, St. Gaul was very soon overrun with the same plague. Grebel arrived in the latter city, where he was received with acclamations by his brethren; and on Palm Sunday, proceeding in company with an immense number of his adherents to the banks of the Sitter, he administered baptism to the whole multitude.

"After this, the spirit of fanaticism displayed itself in freaks of melancholy extravagance. Pretending that our Lord exhorts us to become like little children, these unhappy beings began to jump about in the streets, and to clap their hands together, to dance round and round in numerous circles, to sit down upon the ground, and to roll one another about in the sand. Some of them threw the New Testament into the fire, saying: 'The letter kills, but the Spirit gives life;' while many, falling into convulsions, pretended they had received revelations of the Spirit."

But the most melancholy of all that D'Aubigne records concerning the Anabaptists, is that which he records just here, p. 774: "In a lonely house situated in the vicinity of St. Gaul, upon the Mullegg, there lived an old husbandman, eighty years of age, named John Shucker, who had five sons to bear him company. The whole of this family, as well as their servants, received the ordinance of the new baptism, and two of the sons, Thomas and Leonard, particularly distinguished themselves by their extreme fanaticism. On the 6th of February, 1526, the day being Shrove Tuesday, they invited a large number of Anabaptists to meet in their house, and the father killed a calf to provide for the feast. The viands and the wine sufficed to heat the imaginations of this numerous company, and they passed the whole night in conversation, fantastic gesticulations, convulsions, visions, and revelations.

"In the morning, Thomas, still excited by the excesses of the past night, and having even, as it would appear, lost the power of his reason, took up the bladder of the calf and put into it the gall of the beast, desiring thus to imitate the symbolical actions of the prophets; and, going up to his brother Leonard, he said to him in a somber tone, 'Equally bitter is the death which you must die.' Then added, 'Brother Leonard, kneel down upon your knees.' Leonard did as he was commanded. In a little while he said, 'Brother Leonard, arise;' and Leonard again stood upon his feet. The father, the brothers, and the rest of the Anabaptists, stared in amazement, wondering what might be the will of God. Very soon Thomas once more said, 'Leonard, kneel down again,' and the humble posture was resumed. The spectators, alarmed at the gloomy expression of the unhappy actor, said, 'Reflect upon what you are about to do, and take care that no evil happens.' 'Do not fear,' replied Thomas, 'the will of the Father alone shall be fulfilled.'....At the same moment he hastily seized a sword and aiming a blow with all his strength at the body of his kneeling brother, like a criminal before the executioner, he cut off his head, and exclaimed, 'Now the will of the Father is accomplished.'.... On the 16th of February, the wretched fratricide was beheaded by the hands of the hangman, and fanaticism had been seen to expend its last effort. The eyes of all were opened; and, as an ancient historian has said, 'the same blow served to decapitate alike the body of Thomas Shucker and that of Anabaptism in St. Gaul.' The sect, however, still lived in Zurich; and on the 6th of November of the preceding year, a public dispute had there taken place, in order to give satisfaction to the Anabaptists, who continued to cry out, 'The innocent are condemned without being heard.' The three following theses were proposed by Zwingle and his friends as the subject of conference, and were victoriously maintained by them in the hall of the Council." Here follow the theses:

"Children born of faithful parents are the children of God, like those who were born under the Old Testament; and, consequently, they can receive baptism."

"Baptism is, under the New Testament, that which circumcision was under the Old, consequently baptism must so now be administered to children in the same way as circumcision was formerly administered."

"The usage of baptizing anew cannot be proved, either by example, or by passages, or by arguments drawn from the Scriptures; and those who submit to a new baptism crucify Jesus Christ."

Here is a faithful account of the origin of the people called Anabaptists, and of some of their opinions and doings. John Matthias, the baker, and John Boccold, the tailor, have already been referred to as leaders of the Anabaptists; they, too, claimed to be prophets, and Boccold finally proclaimed himself king by Divine appointment, and his fanatical followers obeyed him as such. They took possession of Munster, an imperial city of Westphalia. I think it was here that Matthias was killed.

It will be seen from the historic records here given, that these Anabaptists did not even claim to have obtained their teachings from the Bible; indeed they commenced by rejecting the Bible, as may be seen by reference to the above quotations; some of them actually threw their Bibles into the fire. They claimed to have received their teachings by direct revelation; they said, "We hold familiar conversation with the Lord." Some said they had a communication from the Angel Gabriel. Another, a little more honest, said, "I am the commencement of baptism," meaning, of course, baptism as he taught and practiced. It will be seen, too, that Melancthon called their Antipedobaptist doctrine a "new doctrine." Nor does it appear that the prophets themselves denied this. As for Luther, when he heard the prophets state their own views, he said, and said truly, "All your affirmations are made up of fables!" It is also worthy of remark, that in the "Theses" quoted above, the reformers take the ground that "Baptism is under the New Testament that which circumcision was under the Old." And with regard to re-baptizing, they not only affirm that it has absolutely no countenance from the word of God, but they look upon the act as involving very serious consequences; and they not only censured the re-baptizers, but they went so far as to say that "Those who submit to a new baptism crucify Jesus Christ!"

Such were the men who introduced the Antipedobaptist novelty; such the time and mode of its introduction: and such the opposition that it met with from the great reformers of the sixteenth century. "But it does not appear," says Bishop Tomlin, "that there was any congregation of Anabaptists in England till the year 1640." And with regard to their commencement in this country, we are informed that it was on this wise. In Rhode Island, Ezekiel Holliman baptized Roger Williams, then Roger turned round and baptized Ezekiel and ten others. Such was their beginning in this western world. Such is the Church that claims to be the only Church, and such the baptism that is claimed to be the only baptism.

Now, we have no sympathy with what is called "the doctrine of succession," no sympathy with the cry, "We have Abraham to our father;" if people are wrong now, we censure them, whoever their father may have been; and if they are right now, we ask no more. But when the Anabaptists vainly, and loudly, talk about their antiquity and ancestry, and claim to be the Church, the only Church, and represent all others as having gone out of the way, it is highly proper, we think, to say to them, "Look to the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged." So far as the Anabaptists are right now we are with them, and bid them God speed; but they must not expect us to endorse the inventions of Munzer, Grebel, Stork, Stubner, Boccold, and other fanatics, as being the teachings of Jesus and his apostles. So far as they hold the truth in common with evangelical Christians, we are with them, and give them due credit, but when they reject what we know to be of Divine appointment, and force upon us what we know to be an unscriptural novelty, we may not submit, nor hold our peace either! And when they are so bigoted and exclusive that they will not sit down with God's people at God's table, or allow any of God's people to sit down with them at their table, let them not cry out for union. Only a few days since, I was told the following: A lady, who was a member of the M. E. Church, feeling that she was dying, sent for her pastor to administer to her the sacrament of the supper, feeling, like her Master, that she should not again drink of this fruit of the vine until that day when she should drink it new in her father's kingdom. The minister hastens to the dying room, the table is spread, and a little group of friends gather around to partake, with the dying woman, of the sacred emblems of Christ's dying love. The husband of the dying woman is in the next room; he is invited to come and receive the holy sacrament with his wife before she dies; but no, he will not: Why? Simply because he belongs to the Baptist Church, and his wife belongs to the M. E. Church! As we said before, so we say again, when such people cry out for union, which they do, under given circumstances, we must doubt their sincerity, we cannot do otherwise! And we verily believe that, till they are ashamed of, and abandon this unchristian practice, they should be left to themselves! And let it be remembered, that their claims to superiority are based upon the novelties that they received from the German fanatics of the sixteenth century! Once more, let them take the Gospel, which they hold, and preach it to sinners, and save all they can, and we will, so far, bid them God speed. But let them not come into our churches and dwellings to pervert and proselyte those whom God has placed under our care, and who, we know, have received Scripture baptism! Let them not do this thing!

And now, ye people of Israel, Christian people of every name, we say to you in conclusion, Consecrate your children to God in holy baptism; remember "the promise is to you and to your children;" and Jesus says to you, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." Bring, then, your children to Jesus, who is as ready now, and as able, to bless them, as he was when he first uttered those blessed words. Bring them, I say, to this blessed Savior, who in the days of his flesh, "took the little children up into his arms, put his hands upon them and blessed them." He claims them as the purchase of his blood, and "the free gift" has already "come upon" them "unto justification of life." Bring them, I say once more, to him who died for them, and who commands you to do so; and as you come, say:

"We bring them, Lord, in thankful hands,
And yield them up to Thee,
Joyful that we ourselves are Thine,
Thine let our offspring be."

And when you baptize "with water," see that you baptize as He does, who baptizes "with the Holy Ghost;" and you know He baptizes by POURING, SHEDDING, FALLING; not by plunging!

CHAPTER XVI.

THE MODE.

The Reviewer contradicts himself by professing to believe that this work will incline many to embrace the Anabaptist faith after he had told us that Mr. A. was "very much interested, edified and comforted," by reading it, so much so that it required a mighty effort on the part of the reviewer to convert him back again!—He again argues on the assumption that bapto always means to dip, plunge or immerse; and yet afterward denies that Baptists ever assume this—It is shown that neither dip, plunge, dive, immerse, pour or sprinkle, is the synonym of baptize—He asserts that bapto is never used for Christian Baptism, though Baptist writers say this word always means to dip, plunge or immerse—The word ebaphe used by the Seventy in Daniel, is again taken up—What I say about plunging, and plunging naked is merely evaded—It is shown, however, that the more intelligent of the Anabaptists admit the difficulty involved in the assumption that the baptisms recorded in the New Testament were by plunging; as an instance Robert Hall is quoted—It is admitted to be only probable that New Testament baptisms were by plunging—Quotations from New Translation and criticisms thereon.

The eight articles here noticed, were published in the Michigan Christian Herald; seven of them over the signature of "O. S.," and the other, viz., that of December 7, 1865, without any signature. The first four are in the form of a dialogue, and the whole eight profess to be a review of, and a reply to, the preceding work on baptism.

In the dialogue, Mr. B. professes to have had a visit from Mr. A., who says he has "just been reading Rev. John Levington's work on Scripture Baptism," and that he has "been very much interested, edified and comforted." Mr. B. tells Mr. A. that he "had just finished its reading" as Mr. A. came in. Both having read the new work they at once enter into a free conversation with regard to it, and, moreover, Mr. A. soon becomes the willing and delighted pupil of Mr. B. The result is, of course, that Mr. B. soon re-converts Mr. A., and so thorough is the work that the young convert requests Mr. B. to return the book to Mr. Levington and cause the latter to return the price thereof, he being now convinced that Mr. L. and his book are alike bad. This Mr. B. refuses to do, choosing rather to circulate it, being convinced that by so doing he will gain many converts to the Baptist faith. But Mr. "O. S." and his pupil A. shall speak for themselves :

"A. I suppose now, you will send Mr. L's book back to its author, that you may have your money refunded, as he has promised, to those who did not like his work?

"B. Send it back? Of course not; it is too precious! I want to put Mr. Levington's book, endorsed by Dr. Duffield, into the hands of converts, that they may see how Methodists and Presbyterians love the Baptists; how kindly they speak! Now, as Mr. L. stigmatizes the Baptists as great proselyters,

I want to make use of this new agency to aid me in this precious work ; his book will be the very thing!

“Already the heaven has begun to work; and you know some of his own members feel so disgusted with his production, that they will not purchase it, nor have it in their houses. We can read in this, which way the influence is tending. He will need the seal of another Doctor of Divinity to make honorable, high-minded men among the Methodists love and patronize the Bible Baptism of Rev. Mr. Levington.”

According to this showing Mr. A. was converted, yea, and “very much interested, edified and comforted” by reading my book, but Mr. B. or Mr. O. S. re-converted him, and, as might be expected, succeeded in giving his proselyte a very unfavorable idea, both of the book and of its author. It will be seen, however, that Mr. B’s profession and his memory are alike unreliable; for, according to his professed belief, my work is well calculated to make converts to the Baptist faith, for this purpose he says my “book will be the very thing,” hence, he refuses to let it go, saying, “it is too precious,” and adds, “Already the heaven has begun to work: and you know some of his own members feel so disgusted with his production, that they will not purchase it, nor have it in their houses.” But the memory of Mr. B., or his judgment, must be greatly at fault, for he told us at the very outset, that Mr. A., by reading my book was converted to my views, yea, and “very much interested, edified and comforted,” so much so that it required a mighty effort on the part of Mr. O. S., (so we will call him in future,) to re-convert him, which effort he has given us in a long series of long articles. Now, any one can see, that if the memory or the judgment of Mr. O. S. had not been strangely at fault he would not have given us the above professed belief in connection with the account of Mr. A's conversion resulting from the reading of my book. Moreover, if my book be such as Mr. O. S. represents it to be, how came it to pass that such marvelous and happy effects were produced in the mind of Mr. A. by simply reading it? Really, Mr. O. S., you have laid us under the necessity of concluding that either yourself, or your pupil, or both, must be very defective either in memory, or in judgment, or in both, or in something else! But, instead of circulating this work for the good of the Baptist denomination, we strongly suspect that Mr. O. S. would have much more faith in the method adopted by those Baptist Elders who told their people not to read my book; and no marvel, for one Church, at least, had lost a very important member in consequence of my book having been circulated there. In this instance you see, Mr. O. S., that the heaven was working the other way! You say, your brother Mr. A. said, before you took him in hand, "I consider the arguments unanswerable," just so this man said, and lest other Baptists should say the same thing, their Elders told them not to read the book. And if Mr. O. S. will write a long series of long articles for the salvation of each one who says so, he will write more than any man ever did! And it would be equally impracticable for him to hold a dialogue with each, especially of such length as that now before us.

As a further evidence that Mr. A. is thoroughly converted, and very shrewd withal, he is represented as saying, "I suppose now, you will send Mr. L's book back to its author, that you may have your money refunded, as he has promised to those who do not like his work?" No, the author of that work never made any such promise, he knows too well that there is a certain class who will dislike a book, or argument, just in proportion to the conclusiveness and force with which it refutes their beloved error. It was the conclusiveness and force of Stephen's argument that caused his enemies to stop their ears, gnash upon him with their teeth, cry out with a loud voice, and stone him!! Upon similar classes of men similar arguments still have a similar effect. - With these views it is not likely that I would promise to return the price of the book to all who do not like it. Not so; the following is what I promised: "If any person, after carefully reading this little work, will honestly say to me, I still believe that the views objected to are the right views, I here promise that I will return to such the price of the work and take it back cheerfully." I am still good for that promise.

We will now notice some of the teachings of Mr. O. S., by which he professes to have produced such a marvelous revolution in the mind of his delighted pupil, Mr. A.; but we must not be expected to notice the small talk and little stories which abound in these productions. Take the following as an instance; it is the first that comes to hand, and is in the first dialogue, no v before me: "B. You put me in mind of a sister in Ohio, who, when asked how she wanted to be baptized, replied, I do not want to be baptized at all, I want to be sprinkled." Now it is quite certain, that men of judgment who have a good cause, and desire themselves and their cause to be respected, will never seek help from silly stories such as the above.

Mr. O. S. complains loudly of the spirit in which my book is written, and says "he felt that the Anabaptists must be put down." Not finding such words in my book, and being determined to make out a grave charge somehow, he quotes my feelings instead of my book, saying, "he feels that the Anabaptists must be put down." To convince his readers that I write in a bad spirit, he gives the following in proof of the assumed fact, "And we verily believe, that, till they are ashamed of, and abandon their unchristian practice, they should be left to themselves." If the reader will turn to p. 142, he will see that Mr. O. S. has substituted the word "their" for my word this, simply, it seems, because he did not wish to tell his readers the PRACTICE to which I objected in this connection. The practice of which I was speaking, was simply their refusing to commune with any of God's people outside of their own denomination, their practice of treating all who do not belong to their denomination as though they were heathen. As an instance of their unchristian PRACTICE in this particular, I stated that a certain lady belonging to the M. E. Church, feeling that she was dying, sent for her pastor to administer to her the Sacrament of the Supper, feeling, like her Master, that she should not again drink of this fruit of the vine until that day when she should drink it new in her Father's kingdom. The pastor and a few friends assemble to commune with this dying Christian; her husband is invited to commune with his dying wife, but he refuses, why? Simply because she belonged to the M. E. Church and he to the Baptist Church! Just here it is that we added the following words: "As we said before, so we say again, when such people cry out for union, which they do under certain circumstances, we must doubt their sincerity, we cannot do otherwise! And we verily believe that, till they are ashamed of, and abandon THIS unchristian practice, they should be left to themselves. And let it be remembered, that their claims to superiority are based upon the novelties that they received from the German fanatics of the sixteenth century." Now the reader can decide who has manifested a bad spirit, I who simply stated a fact, and my honest judgment with regard to that fact, or Mr. O. S., who has represented me as saying and feeling what I never said or felt. Meantime I repeat it, as my honest conviction, that till the Baptists are ashamed of, and abandon THIS unchristian practice, they should be left to themselves; and while they treat us as they do, that is, as being no part of the Church of God. I hold that both honesty and consistency demand that they should accept of their own terms without complaint. We have not made the terms, on the contrary, we complain of them as being unchristian. And I as honestly believe, that this course, if adopted by all the sister denominations, would tend to correct if not lead to the speedy abandonment of THIS truly unchristian practice. As I have caused the word this to be printed in capitals, it is hoped that the word their will not again be substituted for it. It is also hoped that we will not again be called hard names for calling this an unchristian practice, especially as Mr. O. S. insists that things should be "called by their right names, however ridiculous they may sound." Query—Does it ever sound ridiculous to give things their proper names? Our impression is that what is proper is never ridiculous! But for a man professing to be a Christian to refuse to receive the sacrament of the Supper at the same table with his dying Christian wife, simply because she had not been plunged under water by one of his party, must be considered much worse than what is merely ridiculous. To say that such practice and teaching are unchristian, is to use the mildest language that the case will admit of. Indeed our reviewer is evidently conscious of this; hence when he would represent me as writing in an unchristian spirit, he suppresses what we said, and represents us as saying something very different, as we have shown above.

But Mr. O. S. now hastens to the old Baptist refuge, viz.: the assumption that the Greek word baptizo, always expresses their mode of administering Christian baptism, viz.: a plunge into and under water, neither more nor less. It is in support of this assumption that he gives us the following long list of questions and answers:—

"B. Very well, then, let us call things by their right names. I believe you have read Greek a little—about the same as Mr. L.

"A. I have.

"B. Well, then, please tell me what word the Greeks would use if they wished to have an object dipped or immersed.

"A. They would use the word bapto, or baptizo, these are the more common.

"B. Very well; now tell me what were used for sprinkle, pour, or, cleansing and purifying without respect to mode.

"A. For sprinkle they used raino or rantizo. For pour, cheo, and for cleansing and purifying in general they used katharizo and agnizo.

"B. Now please tell me which of these words Christ invariably used for baptizing in the Christian ordinance.

"A. He uses baptizo the verb, and baptisma the noun.

"B. Are these words ever—in a single instance—translated to sprinkle in the Bible.

"A. Never, that I have ever seen or heard of.

"B. Are they ever translated to pour?

"A. Never.

"B. Are the words raino and rantizo or cheo ever translated dip, plunge or immerse? I mean is there one, even one instance on record?

"A. Not an instance that I have ever heard of.

"B. Then when Christ commanded us to baptize, he did not use rantize nor cheize, but a word which signifies to dip, plunge or immerse."

Mark the conclusion of the dialogue, and the end for which it was employed;—"A word which signifies to dip, plunge or immerse." Here it is assumed, as usual, that this word has the meaning or meanings here specified, and no other, and that it is used for the purpose of designating the mode of administering Christian baptism. It means dip, plunge or immerse, neither more nor less." "It will be seen that upon this assumption the entire argument rests, and, of course, the same assumption extends to the prepositions; yet, strange to say, in this very article, and that soon after assuming as above, Mr. O. S. denies the charge. On page 35, I say, "And yet the advocates of plunging, as the only mode of baptism, build their arguments upon the assumption that en, eis and ek, always mean in, into and out of. It is true they admit, at least those of them who are scholars, that these words have a great variety of meanings; but it is equally true that the arguments which they deduce from the narratives of John's and Philip's baptism are all built upon this assumption. Indeed, they admit that the word baptizo has a great variety of meanings, yet, strange as it may appear, their arguments in favor of plunging, are, for the most part, built upon the assumption that it always means to immerse, to dip, to plunge, neither more nor less!" We have seen that it is upon this assumption that Mr. O. S. grounds his argument in the quotations given above, and yet immediately after, he denies the whole, and admits all we claim in the following words:

"B. I will simply say that no Baptist author has assumed what Mr. L. here asserts. But common sense must have something to do—or ought to have—in the interpretation of the prepositions in Greek, the same as in English."

I thank you, sir, for this concession ; now, in future, whether plunging is, or is not, the right mode, I hope you will not rest your defense of it upon the assumption which you have now given up. Only let common sense have something to do with the interpretation of the word baptizo, as well as with the prepositions connected therewith, and this controversy will soon be at an end. Only let common sense do its legitimate work here, and you will no longer represent God as plunging men and women in the Holy Ghost and in fire, which you must do if to baptize means to plunge, neither more nor less, for God certainly baptized, and still baptizes men and women, but he does not plunge them ! Only let common sense have something to do with the interpretation of these words, and we will no longer hear of all Israel being plunged into Moses, and all Christians plunged into Christ ; all of which is certainly true, if the Bible is true, and if these words mean to plunge into, neither more nor less ! But the fact is, time would fail to specify all the absurdities involved in the assumption here objected to ; therefore we will only add, let common sense have something to do with the interpretation of these words, and the New Baptist Bible will soon drop into oblivion, or only be remembered with regret and shame. O that I could but hope that you, sir, and all Baptists, would abide by the concession which you have now made, but, alas, I cannot even hope that you will do so. I fear it would be a vain hope.

Just here it may be well to give a few quotations from the New Testament lately published by Immersionists :

Matt. iii. 11 ; "I indeed immerse you in water unto repentance ; but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear, he shall immerse you in the Holy Spirit and fire." Mark i. 4, 5, "John came immersing in the wilderness, and preaching the immersion of repentance unto the remission of sins. And there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were immersed by him in the river Jordan confessing their sins." Luke iii. 3, "And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the immersion of repentance unto the remission of sins." Verse 16, "He shall immerse you in the Holy Spirit and in fire." Acts i. 5, "For John truly immersed in water ; but ye shall be immersed in the Holy Spirit not many days hence." Acts ii. 38. "Then Peter said unto them, Repent, and be each of you immersed upon the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of sins." Acts xi. 16. Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed immersed in water, but ye shall be immersed in the Holy Spirit." Acts xix. 3. "And he said unto them, unto what, then, were ye immersed ? And they said, unto John's immersion."

It would be folly to attempt to criticise the above and similar ; yea, worse passages in the new translation. The following remarks, however, we think deserve attention. Though immersionists build their arguments in favor of immersion, upon the assumption that eis always means into, they do not so translate that word in their new translation ; for instance, in Acts xix. 3, eis occurs twice, and twice they translate it UNTO ; because they did not like to represent the parties as saying, WE WERE IMMERSSED INTO JOHN'S IMMERSION! And if we substitute the word plunge, which they give us as the synonym of immerse, and which alone properly expresses their practice, then the reading will be, We were plunged into John's plunging! This is only one of the many instances in which they do not render the Greek prepositions, en and eis, in and into. Yet these same persons bitterly complain of others because they do not always translate en and eis in and into! I give also the following instance furnished by a friend. "They charge us with a wicked tampering with the Word of God, because we do not always translate the Greek word bapto by the word immerse. But turning to the 'new version,' Mark x. 38, 39, the word occurring six times is four times translated endure, and twice immerse." Whether these may be considered instances of inconsistency, or dishonesty, the reader may decide! One thing is certain, this people should now be called Immersers, not Baptists, seeing they plead for immersion only, and have abandoned the word baptize altogether; so much so, that the word baptize never once occurs in their new translation of the New Testament. So that according to their own showing they have no baptism at all, but immersion only! Moreover, they call John the Baptist "John, the Immerser," hence they should certainly take the same name to themselves.

Having again looked into the Anabaptist New Translation, I beg to present to the reader the following additional quotations and remarks:

Luke xvi. 20, they translate "dip;" Matt. xxvi. 23,

“dipped;” Mark xiv. 20, “dips,” and Rev. xix. 13, “dipped.” Here they acknowledge that the common translation is correct, except that they attempt to improve it by substituting “dips” for dippeth. They also acknowledge, by this translation, that baptize, dip, plunge and immerse, are not synonymous terms, though they have long asserted, and assumed that they are. Mark vii. 4, they translate, “And coming from the market except they immerse themselves, they do not eat.” It will be remembered that these translators say, immerse means to baptize, that is, as they assert, to plunge under water; now we simply ask, do these men believe that all the Jews always baptized themselves, that is plunged themselves under water, before eating, when they came from market? Does the reader believe this? Does any Jew now living believe or practice this? was it, or is it, always possible for them to do this? Heb. vi. 1, 2 is translated, “Not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of immersions, and of laying on of hands.” In Matt. xx. 22, 23, the word βαπτω in different forms occurs six times. But in the New Translation it does not occur at all, being left out altogether. I am aware that in some copies of the original the word does not occur in the text of Matt.; but, as Watson observes, on the place, “It is found in the greater number of MSS., and not only coincides with the context, but is found in the parallel place, Mark x. 38, 39,” about which there is no dispute. In this text the word occurs in the original, as in the common translation, six times, but in the new translation, or, more properly, the new perversion, it is excluded altogether, and the word immerse introduced only twice. And, what makes the matter worse, the word "endure" is introduced four times, though that word does not occur once in the original. The fact is, as I said formerly, it is extremely difficult to get the word plunge, or immerse, into this passage at all, and its introduction at the best is offensive, and here intolerable. But being determined to introduce it, they have resorted to this desperate method, and have perpetrated this daring and sacrilegious fraud, for it is alike daring and fraudulent!

I will here introduce the passage as it stands in the new translation: "Are ye able to drink the cup that I drink, or to endure the immersion which I endure? And they said to him, We are able. And Jesus said to them: Ye shall indeed drink the cup that I drink, and endure the immersion which I endure."

Luke xii. 50, in the common translation, reads, "But I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished." In the new translation this passage reads thus: "But I have an immersion to undergo; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!" Here the same fraud is perpetrated. For βαπτισμα, which is the word in the original, they give us the word "immersion," but βαπτισθω they leave out altogether, and introduce the word "undergo," which is not in the text at all. The reason for this is the same as in the former case; they did not like to render the passage, I have an immersion to be immersed with! and they must do this, or submit to the common translation, which would be fatal to their cause, or do as they have done, which in our judgment is still more fatal. Acts x. 37, they translate, "After the immersion that John preached." Acts xiii. 24, they translate, "John having first preached, before his entrance, the immersion of repentance to all the people of Israel." In 1 Cor. xii. 13, our sapient translators give us the following, "For by one Spirit we are all immersed into one body." Rom. vi. 3, 4, they translate thus, "Know ye not that all we who were immersed into Jesus Christ were immersed into his death? We were buried therefore with him by the immersion into his death." "Immersed into Jesus Christ." "By the immersion into his death." Here we will not venture any criticism. We will only say, "Let him that readeth understand," for I am sure I do not! Gal. iii. 27, reads, "For all ye who were immersed into Christ, did put on Christ." John i. 33, reads, "The same is he who immerses in the Holy Spirit." All this is equally inexplicable!

It will be remembered that the Anabaptists rest their arguments in favor of plunging upon the assumption that eis always means into, and they object to our giving that preposition any other meaning. But they do not abide by that rule in their new translation. In Acts xix. 3, they twice translate unto, just as it is in the common translation. Thus, after all their ado about baptizo and the prepositions, they are forced to come over to our position. Why? Just because, as I have shown, the view they contend for implies absurdity and impossibility. Hence, when they come to apply their rule they shrink from the consequences. Had they translated eis, into, in this verse, then it would have read, even if immerse were allowed,

"Into what then were ye immersed? And they said, into John's immersion!" They shrink from this, and translate us unto, not into. For the same reason they so translate Mark i. 4. In their new translation this verse reads thus, "John came immersing in the wilderness, and preaching the immersion of repentance unto remission of sins." It is true this is bad enough, but preaching the immersion of repentance INTO the remission of sins, would be worse; and it would be still worse to read, preaching the plunging of repentance into the remission of sins! They evidently see, they must see, that their position is not tenable. And it is highly to their discredit that they do not acknowledge the fact, for they are convinced of the fact. This is clearly evinced by the quotations which we have given from their new translation, and by many other passages which might be quoted from that marvelous production. But the worst of all is, their palming upon an unsuspecting people, a perverted copy of the word of life: and the guilt is aggravated by the fact, that the fraud cannot be detected by the masses of the people, because they cannot appeal to the original; this is a fact which the translators well understand! And this fact renders it the more necessary that we should expose the fraud, and this we have attempted to do with all honesty, for God knows we believe what we say. It is possible, however, that we may mistake in some minor particulars; but, if any one will point out such mistake, we will acknowledge it, and correct it, in the next edition.

We call special attention to the fact, that, as Anabaptists themselves translate us, unto, and that in connection with John's baptism, they thereby give up the assumption to which we have objected, and upon which their principal arguments rest. They can no longer say "John went down into," or "Philip went down into ; for they cannot show why εἰς should not be rendered unto in this part of the narrative, as well as in the other part. And if we read, as even their own translation authorizes, They went down to, or unto, the water ; and came up from the water, then these narratives do not afford so much as a presumption that there was any plunging under the water ! Such is the authority to which these teachers are constantly appealing in favor of their unscriptural, or, rather antiscryptural position. They will assert with all the appearance of confidence that their practice is so clearly taught in the New Testament, that teaching is altogether unnecessary : even the children have only to read for themselves, and they will at once believe just as the Anabaptists do !

As a specimen of this confident, imposing style, we give the following from an article in the Michigan Christian Herald of August 1, 1866, the present month, under this heading,

"WHAT CHURCH SHALL I JOIN ?

"It is strange, indeed, that any person professing to be converted and to love the Lord Jesus Christ, and holding in his hand the New Testament, which is the only perfect and all-sufficient guide in all questions of religious duty given by the Head of the Church, to direct His disciples in things he requires them to do as disciples, should falter, for a moment, as to the true method of settling this inquiry. Would Jesus make the way of salvation so plain and yet not make the subsequent path of duty equally plain to his followers? Did the question, what church shall we join? ever occur to the mind of a young convert in Apostolic times as it does now to many? Not at all. This is evident, because there was but one church for him to join. Jesus said to his ministers, 'teach them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.' In obedience to these instructions all converts were taught to put on Christ by being buried with him in baptism; and with such pastors and teachers as the church then had, no person who did not obey, could have been received a member."

Again. "From these premises it is a strictly logical deduction that all who obeyed gospel instruction (and all other is worthless), were immersed; and consequently that there were none but immersed—or, as they are now called—Baptist churches for disciples to join. There was none but the one New Testament church—built on the same foundation—professing the same faith—organized on the same principles—composed of members voluntarily, individually, and openly consecrated to Jesus Christ by the same act of baptismal burial."

After giving us much more of this sort of talk, together with the solemn caution, "See that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the Mount," we are furnished, as usual, with a little story. The subject of the story is said to be the daughter of "a Methodist minister." The following extract is in harmony with the other parts of the article, and tends to show still more clearly, what it is that the author of the article aims at.

Being converted in a certain revival, "she began to search the Word of God. Her father, a Methodist minister, furnished her with other books—favoring, of course, his own views—till she requested him to get her no more; she preferred to seek light from the New Testament. It is scarcely necessary to add that she did join the Baptist Church."

Finally, this champion for plunging, closes his article thus: "With a child-like, teachable spirit, go to the Word of God, resolve to seek for light till you see the example and command of Christ bright and clear; then obey with a cheerful heart," that is, of course, go down to the river and be plunged! And for so doing, it is here pretended that "the example and command of Christ," are "bright and clear."

What confidence is to be placed in such high-sounding words will be seen at once by any one who will read in connection therewith the extracts given above, from the New Translation. And, they will see, too, how "bright and clear" are the teachings and arguments of Anabaptists on this subject; while the extracts here given from a newspaper article, may suffice to show their STYLE when they write or talk on this subject.

But, bad as is the style of teaching, the thing taught is still worse. Notice the following assertions "All who obeyed gospel instruction were immersed."

All were "openly consecrated to Jesus Christ by the same act of baptismal burial." By "openly," is meant, I suppose, publicly. I wonder if the jailer was publicly buried under water, both "he and all his," in the jail at Philippi, sometime after midnight! Paul, too, was baptized in the house of Judas. Here is the record; "And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales; and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized." In vain do we look for the modern Anabaptist display in connection with the baptism of the jailer at Philippi, or in connection with the baptism of Paul in the house of Judas in Damascus! But we proceed to notice one or two more of these bold assertions. In primitive times, we are told, "there were none but immersed, or, as they are now called, Baptist Churches for disciples to join." It is here acknowledged that the phrase Baptist church is of modern date, while it seems to be claimed that the title, "Immersed Church," is the ancient and proper one! Once more. In those days "All converts were taught to put on Christ by being buried with him in baptism." Now, I simply ask, what idea must they have of "putting on Christ," who teach, or are taught, that this is done by a sudden plunge of the body under water? On the words, "But put ye on the Lord Jesus," Rom. xiii. 14, Mr. Wesley has the following beautiful note: "Herein is contained the whole of our salvation. It is a strong and beautiful expression for the most intimate union with him, and being clothed with all the graces which were in him. The apostle does not say, Put on purity and sobriety, peacefulness and benevolence, but he says all this and a thousand times more at once, in saying 'Put on Christ.'" And we might add, he does not say, "Put on Christ" by being plunged, or buried in water; no, the soul cannot be clothed with the above graces by plunging the body under water; if it could, methinks I would plunge and advocate plunging eighteen hours in the day; and I would vie with the most zealous of all the Anabaptists. I would have all the Methodists, and Presbyterians, and Episcopalians, and Roman Catholics, yea, and the Baptists too, and all others under water with the least possible delay! Oh how gladly would I plunge under the waters of Lake Erie all the people of this city, and then, seeing them all clothed with the graces of the blessed Jesus, instead of saying, "Now let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation," I would go to Detroit and other places, and continue the blessed work as long as I should be able to put a human being under water! But, alas! the pleasing dream vanishes in the presence of fact, and before the word of God, which sayeth, "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus;" "By grace are ye saved through faith;" "the blood of Jesus Christ, his son, cleanseth us from all sin;" "for it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins," and it is equally impossible that water should do this, or impart the graces above specified, and, remember, he who has them not, has not put on Christ, however often he may have been plunged under water!

The fact is, with regard to the sacred rite of baptism, Anabaptists seem to lose sight of the thing, and place all the stress upon the act or mode of administration; their whole mind, when treating on this subject, seems to be occupied with the single idea of a sudden plunge, or duck, in water; and, by the way, this last word seems to express their mode still more accurately than does the word plunge, for they merely give the head and upper part of the body a sudden duck under the water, and this they call putting on Christ! With them this single act seems to be the grand panacea! while the thing, the unspeakably glorious thing, expressed by the word baptism, seems to be lost sight of. Oh how common is it for poor carnal man to substitute something merely outward, for the work and fruit of the Spirit!

But you gravely ask your pupil to tell you "what word the Greeks would use if they wished to have an object dipped or immersed." Now, my dear sir, as you have been doing all the asking and answering hitherto, please allow me to do a little in this way. Suppose a Baptist wished to have an object dipped what would he say? Methinks he would say dip it, especially if he would allow common sense to have something to do in the matter! Or, suppose your wife, if you have one, desired some of her domestics to dip some candles, what would she say? I really think the good lady would not say baptize some candles! I rather think she would say dip them! Or, suppose it were ironing-day, and the good lady wished to have some cloths sprinkled preparatory to their being ironed, what would she say? Would she say, Jane, baptize those cloths? It strikes me very forcibly that she would say, Jane, sprinkle those cloths. She certainly would if she allowed common sense to have any thing to do in such matters; and as ladies are in the habit of making good use of common sense in such matters, she would, doubtlessly, so express her desire; for it is in religious matters, rather than in domestic matters, that people are in the habit of throwing away their common sense!

As it now seems to be my turn to ask questions, I will improve the opportunity by asking a few more. Suppose you, sir, were asking God to baptize your soul with the Holy Ghost, which I trust you frequently do, what word would you use? Would you say, O Lord, plunge my soul with the Holy Ghost? or would you say, dip my soul with the Holy Ghost? Or, suppose you were praying with and for the congregation, what word would you use? Would you say, O Lord, plunge, or dip this congregation in the Holy Ghost? No, my friend; fond as you are of these words, you would not use them in this connection, nor would any one. Neither would those who baptize by sprinkling, or by pouring, say, O Lord, sprinkle my soul in the Holy Ghost; pour my soul with the Holy Ghost; pour my soul in the Holy Ghost! Such language is so shocking, that probably no man, however ignorant and fanatical, would, or ever did, use it; and why? I answer, because neither dip, plunge, immerse, pour or sprinkle, is the synonym of baptize, hence the absurdity of using either of them as such. In proof of this position, if further proof is needed, it is only necessary to observe that you may pour a thousand times, sprinkle five thousand times, dip ten thousand times, and plunge one million times, and yet not BAPTIZE at all! But this could not be said with truth or propriety, if either of these words were the synonym of the word

BAPTIZE: for then, to say as above, would be to say, you may pour and yet not pour, sprinkle and not sprinkle, dip and not dip, plunge and not plunge! This, then, is the first grand error into which the Anabaptists have fallen, and that which has caused so many other mistakes. Another mistake into which they have fallen, is their constantly assuming that the word baptizo, or baptisma, is given simply to express the mode of administering that sacrament or rite. But this is not the fact, for it is used by our blessed Lord to express the thing rather than the mode; hence neither sprinkle nor plunge is a proper substitute for it, for these words necessarily express the mode of an act, but do not necessarily, or in themselves, express baptism at all. These two mistakes have involved this subject in more mist and fog than all other mistakes put together. Perhaps we would be safe in saying that they are the source of all the other mistakes. Had not Mr. O. S. fallen into these mistakes, he never would have given us the above list of silly questions, after which he asks, "Now will you call things by their proper names after this?" Would that you might do so, then you would no more substitute the word plunge for baptize; nor would we any more hear of plunging or dipping in the Holy Ghost, if things were called by their proper names! Let it be remembered, then, that the word which the writers of the New Testament employ to designate this rite or sacrament, includes several very weighty and important ideas; viz., a sign, a seal, an oath a covenant, wash, cleanse, purify, consecrate. I think all these ideas are included in, and expressed by the word BAPTIZO, when there is a proper subject. But this is not true of any of the other words, and it is highly probable that we have no word that we could with propriety substitute for this word ! We have some words that will express some of these ideas, but no one that will express them all. As to the words dip and plunge, they express none of them at all, no, not one!

Referring to 1st Corinthians x. 2, Bishop Pearce, as quoted by Parkhurst, says, "They were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea ; i. e., into that covenant, and into obedience to those laws which Moses delivered to them from God ; so βαπτίζεσθαι εἰς χριστον is rendered to be baptized into Christ, and signifies to be baptized into the profession of Christ's laws and doctrine." Parkhurst on the word baptizo, when referring to the words dip, plunge, immerse, says, "But in the New Testament it occurs not strictly in this sense."

But it is useless to quote further, as we have said so much on this subject formerly. Moreover, Carson says, "All the lexicons and commentators are against me." This is true, and this is enough. But the worst of all is, the plain text of Scripture is against him, as we have shown formerly.

In the work which Mr. O. S. has under review, I had spoken in strong language against the practice of re-baptizing. And long ago, Dr. A. Clarke had said, "In my view, it is an awful thing to iterate baptism." To all this our reviewer replies thus, "You perceive, then, that we are not Anabaptists, because we do not re-baptize ; we merely baptize such as have been rantized." This needs no comment. I merely give the quotation, at all may know the fact; viz., that all outside the Anabaptist church are classed with unbaptized heathen. It is here declared that those millions who have been consecrated to the adorable Trinity in holy baptism, have never been baptized at all! And in this way he claims that his denomination are not Anabaptists; no, they only baptize those who had been sprinkled! Is not this profane? But where is the common sense that he said should have something to do here? Alas! it does not seem to have either part or lot in the matter; for if common sense had been allowed to speak, methinks it would have told him that it was equally easy for his neighbor to say to him, "Your people are not baptized at all; they are only plunged!" But all this is the result of falling into the mistakes which we have exposed above.

We give the following long quotation from our reviewer, that he may have the full benefit of it, and that others may have a chance to judge of it, and ascertain its meaning, if they can, for we confess ourselves somewhat puzzled by it:

"There is one thing more I wish to ask just here, is the word bapto ever used for the Christian ordinance of baptism?"

"A. No, it is not.

"B. What, then, can we think of the honesty of Mr. L., when he tells us that Nebuchadnezzar was 'baptized with the dew of heaven,' when a word is used, which is never used for the Christian ordinance? Did not Mr. L. know this? If he did not, he ought not to have written thus ; but if he did, as he would have his readers understand, then there is evidence of intention to mislead his readers who do not understand Greek."

I cannot see why our reviewer should be at a loss to know why I quoted the text in Daniel, from the Septuagint ; I specify the end for which I quote it, viz., to show that the seventy did not understand the word bapto in the sense of plunge, for they use it, or its derivative, εβαφη, to express the act of the dew falling from heaven upon the king ; and St. Paul uses it for a similar purpose, viz., to express the act of the spray, and of the dew, falling upon the Israelites when "they passed through the sea on dry land," and when they were "under the cloud." He also used it to express those acts of the Jews, when they sprinkled with water and with blood, or otherwise applied these liquids, which acts he calls divers baptisms. The common translation has it, "divers washings," but the original Greek reads, διαφοροις βαπτισμοις, divers baptisms.

Mr. O. S. says, "When they wished to express the use of water in any way, they had a word expressive exactly of what they wished to do." Grant it, what then ? Paul knew all these words, yet he neither uses παντιζω nor χεα, nor any other word that expresses a specific mode. Why ? Simply because he is speaking of "divers baptisms," and, consequently, uses the word βαπτισμις as that which comprehended all the modes of applying the elements specified, which is not true of any one of the other words, because each one expresses one specific mode, and no more, and therefore could not be used in this connection, where several modes and elements were intended. After speaking of these divers baptisms, the Apostle gives several instances, and each is by sprinkling, both with blood and with water. See Hebrews ix. 19-21. It deserves special remark, too, that this baptism by sprinkling blood and water, was understood to be a sign of cleansing and a sealing of the covenant, which Christian baptism confessedly is.

As my reviewer asserts that I must either be ignorant or dishonest, simply because I quote, as applicable to the subject in hand, the text in Daniel, I may be permitted to say that I am in good company; for the same text has been quoted, for the same purpose, by many whose honesty and ability will bear the angry attacks of Anabaptists about as well as the rocks by the sea-shore bear the surges of the angry billows.

Out of many such authors, I will select but one, viz., Taylor, Editor of Calmet's Dictionary, and author of that learned work on baptism, from which I have already quoted. He says:

"The baptism by the Holy Ghost was conferred by the descending of the baptismal element. Are there any instances of the use of the word baptism in reference to water, which instances also mark the descending of the baptismal element? If there are, then water baptism must be taken in a sense strictly coincident with baptism by the Holy Ghost; or else we render one part of the Word of God repugnant to the other. The first instance is afforded by the Greek translators of Daniel, who inform us that Nebuchadnezzar, in his deranged state, should be baptized with the dew of heaven—Daniel iv. 23, 25, 33; and this is repeated, to inform us that he really was baptized with the dew of heaven, verse 21, affording so many unquestionable applications of the word baptize, to the descent of the dew of heaven upon Nebuchadnezzar. The vapors raised into the atmosphere during the heat of the day, descended, shed themselves, fell down, during the colder hours of the evening and night, on the person of the unhappy Babylonian monarch. By these, say the seventy, he was baptized! A clearer instance of descent there cannot be.” Facts and evidences, pp. 114, 115.

This is only one of the instances which this learned author gives to show that the descent of the element upon the body, as well as the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the soul, is called baptism. It will now be seen that this learned author, according to the showing of Mr. O. S., is quite as ignorant, or quite as dishonest as I am! Be this as it may, however, we will give one more quotation from this same author, and it will probably prove still more annoying than that already given. Here it is:

“The word baptize is never used in the seventy in the sense of PLUNGING; nor is it so understood by our translators, except in one instance, Job ix. 31, for the sake of a strength of expression.”

But why does my reviewer charge me with ignorance or dishonesty, merely because, like others, I quoted the above text from the Septuagint? The reason he gives for so doing is simply this, because in that text “a word is used which is never used for the Christian ordinance." See the whole quotation as given above.

The reader will observe, that the word concerning which he makes this assertion is bapto. Now, if the reader will please to look again at the long list of questions which we previously furnished from this same article, he will find these words: "Please tell me what word the Greeks would use if they wished to have an object dipped or immersed? They would use the word bapto, or baptizo; these are the more common." At one time, we are told these words "always mean to dip, plunge or immerse, neither more nor less," now we are told that this use or meaning is "the more common." And while our reviewer tells us that the Greeks would use the words bapto or baptizo, when they wished to have an object dipped or immersed, at least that these words were more commonly used for this purpose, he at the same time tells us that this same word bapto "is never used for the Christian ordinance." What! a word that always means to dip or immerse, is never used for the Christian ordinance! Is not this conceding more than we claim? unless he means to say that Christ and his apostles do not use it in the sense of immerse or plunge; if so, we agree with him. I am aware that the verb bapto is not found in those texts in the New Testament where the sacrament of baptism is spoken of, but is it not the root from which we have all the words used to designate this ordinance? Is it not the root from which the Seventy derived the word which they employ to designate or express the action of the dew falling upon Nebuchadnezzar? Moreover, Baptists, it is well known, give us the following as their own position, and as the basis upon which they rest almost all their arguments in favor of plunging, viz., "BAPTISM, from the Greek word baptizo, of bapto, I dip or plunge;" "to dip, plunge, or immerse." The amount is this, baptizo is from bapto, and as the latter means dip, plunge, or immerse, so does the former. But does not ebaphe, the word used by the Seventy, come from the same root that baptizo is derived from? And, consequently, does it not come under the same law of interpretation? Is it not a mere quibble to say that this "word is never used in the Christian ordinance," simply because it is a different inflection of the same verb? And all this because the meaning that the Seventy give to it is fatal to the cause of plunging! Thus it is that the advocates of plunging take and give, assert and deny the same thing, just as that thing seems to favor or go against them!

Though we have been at this trouble to correct the above strange assertion, as well as the uncalled for reflections, which, doubtless, would pass for argument with some, it is not because our views need the help which that text in the Septuagint affords: no, that kind of argument is furnished abundantly elsewhere; for instance, the single fact that the various applications of different elements under the Jewish economy, are by the apostle Paul all called Baptisms, is of itself sufficiently conclusive of all we claim. And when to this we add the all-important fact, that God baptized by the outpouring of the Spirit, and that the descent of the Spirit upon the parties is, by the Divine Administrator himself, called BAPTISM, our argument becomes overwhelmingly conclusive; especially when it is considered that, to meet all this, nothing is brought forward but inference and conjecture, without one clear text, or one well authenticated fact! Moreover, let it be well observed, that though many clear texts, and well authenticated facts could be produced in favor of baptism by plunging, that would not prove that baptism by pouring is no baptism; for God says it is baptism; so that even then, our argument would remain unchanged and unaffected; the consequence would merely be, that our opponents would gain something, while we would lose nothing!

Seeing Mr. O. S. admits that the Greek prepositions, at least, have more applications than that which Baptists in their arguments assume to be their only application, one would think the matter might rest here, but no, he returns to it to prove that by admitting more than one application "the Universalists would beat me every time." Well, my dear sir, as you have admitted what I claim, in this particular, would they not beat you as well as me! But I will show you, however, that I have only to do with them what I have done with the Baptists, and I will beat them every time! For instance, when they say that the words Sheol and Hades mean the grave, I have only to say, whether they do or do not, it is quite certain that they have not that meaning here; for the punishment here specified is not that of a dead body, but that of a living soul. Moreover, the grave is the receptacle of the dead and corrupting body, not that of the immortal Spirit. Again, the place here spoken of burns with fire and brimstone; nay, more, it is a lake of fire, and a bottomless pit; and of those unhappy ones who find their way there, it is said that the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever: and surely I cannot represent the inspired writers, or any man of common sense, as saying all this of a little hole, say eight feet by four, dug in the ground! I would now beg the Universalist to notice that this grave is for the righteous and the wicked, alike; whereas the Sheol, or Hades, spoken of in the text under consideration, is for the wicked only; "The wicked shall be turned into hell." Now you see, Mr. O. S., how easy it is for me to beat the Universalists every time, when they attempt to support their cause by criticisms about as good as those which you employ to support your cause. As to the word αιωνιος, which they also try to evade, I can beat them there just as easily; but it is no part of my work to do so, just now, as it is with Anabaptists that I am arguing, not with Universalists!

Those who have read the work which Mr. O. S. has under review will remember that I present many objections to plunging as the only mode of baptism, and especially to plunging naked. The manner in which our reviewer attempts to meet those objections, or rather to evade them, is in keeping, and shows that he is simply fast! Hear him speaking professedly to his pupil, who is represented as making enquiry as to this particular; he replies thus:

"B. I know Mr. L. says a great many ludicrous things; and as his imagination runs back to scenes of baptizing men and women naked, he evidently wants to say some very indecent things, but as it is he shows what is in—pardon the preposition—his heart!

With regard to the difficulty of plunging 3,000 on the day of pentecost he gives the following:

“B. But don’t you know at the close of that chapter—Acts ii.—it is said they were ‘praising God having favor with all the people?’”

From this he seems to conclude that the Jews freely offered their cisterns and baths, so that the apostles found little difficulty in plunging them all!

After some trifling reference to Dr. Adam Clarke and Mr. Hibbard, he seems glad to jump to a conclusion thus: “What Mr. L. says about the baptism of the Eunuch you may set over against the note of Dr. A. Clarke.” Here I have only to say that the writings of Dr. Hibbard, and those of Dr. Clarke, are not under review, and as those gentlemen neither need nor desire my help, I have nothing to say here with regard to what they have, or have not said; and to set my arguments “over against the note of Dr. A. Clarke” is simply to evade my arguments, and to confess that they are felt to be unanswerable! As to the insinuation that I have said, or desired to say, something naughty, I have only to say that I am not conscious of having said, or of desiring to say, any thing but what should be said and what, in my judgment, might be said without risk by the best scholar and the best Christian, neither of which I am or claim to be. And as to the difficulties which I claim to be involved in the opinion that plunging is the only baptism that God has appointed or will accept I have specified them formerly, and beg to say here, that it is folly to attempt to evade them; nay, it is worse than folly, it is disingenuous! The supposition that the apostles plunged three thousand men and women in Jerusalem in a few hours, and that John plunged, say three million in Jordan during a short period of his brief ministry, is simply incredible; especially when it is remembered that those vast multitudes were made up of persons of different constitutions and circumstances, having reached different periods in life, from the youth to the aged of both the sexes, including the feeble, the delicate, and the infirm, together with the sick, the invalid and the cripple! And if it should be said that all such were excluded from the sacred rite because they were such, it only makes the matter still worse! Finally, at every given period of time there have been, and are, multitudes whom it would be cruel, fatal, and even impossible, to plunge in cold water; and yet, the theory objected to represents the infinitely good and wise God as enjoining all this upon all men to whom his Gospel shall be preached! Now, Mr. O. S. may set all this "over against Dr. A. Clarke's note," if he pleases, but it is folly for him to expect sensible people to believe that in this way he will make his system acceptable, and prove it to be scriptural! The fact is the advocates of this system, at least those of them who allow themselves to think, are sensible of these difficulties, and some of them are candid enough to acknowledge them. For instance, Robert Hall, referring to the vast numbers baptized by John, says, "It is by no means certain, however, that John was the only person that performed that ceremony; indeed, when we consider the prodigious multitudes that flocked to him it seems scarcely practicable; he most probably employed coadjutors." Now, while this invention, for it is purely an invention, seems to remove a little of the difficulty in one particular, it increases it in another. If even John's authority to baptize was questioned till thorough investigation was had, and evidence furnished, what would have been the result if others who could furnish no evidence of a divine call had baptized? See John i. 19, 28.

But the difficulty here admitted is only a single item of the mountain difficulties. Only a few weeks since, a gentleman told me that his aged mother, who has embraced the plunging idea earnestly desires to be baptized, but she is too old and infirm to be plunged, and as she believes that to be the only way she has concluded to die unbaptized! Yes, and if that is the only baptism, millions in every age must die like her, unbaptized! Let them believe this opinion who can, I can not!

The next article or dialogue, which is very long, has in it little that is worthy of notice, being made up almost entirely of small talk, assertion, special pleading, or something entirely irrelevant. Stuart, Wall, Barnes, Doddridge, H. W. Beecher, a Dr. Geo. Campbell, and a Dr. Woods, are appealed to, or quoted, for what purpose it would be difficult to say. In reply, I have only to say, whether those gentlemen are, or are not, in favor of plunging as the only Christian baptism, I still object to that position, and have given my reasons for so doing. Now, the work of my opponent is simply to refute my arguments, and establish the position to which I object, not to prove that those gentlemen and others were great men and great scholars. Moreover, I know it is not a very uncommon thing for the advocates of plunging to claim men to be in their favor who really are not.* Be that as it may, my work is to establish what I believe to be the right view of this Christian ordinance in opposition to what I believe to be the wrong view; not to go all over creation defending or opposing every individual that has written on the subject. If Mr. O. S. will establish his position, by the grace of God, I trust, I would embrace it with him, though Clarke, Doddridge, Stuart and a hundred others should oppose. There, are, however, a few things in this article which it may be well enough to notice briefly. Dr. Wall is represented as saying, when speaking of "dipping," "It was, in all probability, the way by which our Savior, and for certain, was the most usual way by which the ancient Christians did receive their baptism." Thus, after the oft repeated assertion by our reviewer and Anabaptists generally, that plunging is so clearly the only mode taught and practiced by the apostles and the primitive Christians, that no man of common sense and honesty can doubt it, so much so, that teaching on the subject is altogether unnecessary; even children have only to read the New Testament and they will form no other idea. I say after all this, we are now told that "in all probability it is the way in which our Savior was baptized, and the most usual way by which the ancient Christians did receive their baptism." Is not this marvelous? And it is still more marvelous, that Wall, in the same quotation from which I take the above extract, is represented as saying, "This immersion is so plain and clear, by an infinite number of passages, that one can but pity the weak endeavors of such Pedobaptists as would maintain the negative of it." Thus Wall is represented as saying that Scripture only makes it probable that our Savior was baptized by immersion, and also that immersion is plainly and clearly supported "by an infinite number of passages!" Truly this is reckless, as well as marvelous. Moreover, we think it is with a poor grace that such persons feign to pity us for not believing as certain that which they confess is merely probable from Scripture evidence, while it is only claimed to be "the most usual way by which the ancient Christians did receive their baptism." Indeed, this is admitting what we have claimed, and still claim, viz., that there is not one clear text of Scripture in favor of baptism by plunging, no not one! But it is a fact, an indisputable fact, that God baptized by pouring! Nor can it be denied, we think, that the application of different elements is by the Apóstle Paul called "divers baptisms." Now, when we add these facts to the other facts, texts and arguments, which we advanced formerly, we think the pity is due to those who ignore them all, and yet have confessedly nothing to offer in favor of plunging, beyond mere probability. It is clear, therefore, that the pity, or blame, as the case may be, is due to the Anabaptists, not to us. In their favor, therefore, we concede all claim to pity in this instance. Nor do we admit that they have even as much as probability in their favor, while we have the teaching and practice of the Almighty in our favor.

CHAPTER XVII.

REVIEW ON INFANT BAPTISM AND REPLY THERETO.

The Reviewer fails to show the existence of an Antipedobaptist Church before that founded by the German fanatics—They must accept of these fanatics as the fathers of their system, or be without known parents, while our practice is traced to the Apostles—Having shown the terrible consequences of applying to infants what was intended for adults only, the Reviewer utterly fails to avoid those consequences, and even involves himself in other difficulties—He even denies that circumcision was a sign and seal --It is admitted that infant baptism was practised in the middle of the second century—It is in vain that his system seeks help from Tertullian—His singular Criticism upon the testimony of Irenæus, and the reply thereto—His feeble attempt to meet the argument based upon the Greek words, oikos and oikia, and the answer thereto—It is again admitted that infant baptism was practised all but universally in the middle of the second century—Soon after he asserts the contrary—another singular and entirely unsuccessful attempt to find an Antipedobaptist society before the German fanatics—The Donatists and Novatians are claimed as their ancestors—In reply, the history of those heretical sects is given—Bad as these sects were, there is no evidence that they were Antipedobaptists—Our principal arguments are either ignored or merely evaded—The statement, “We will have no inference, nothing but positive command,” is examined, and its weakness exposed—It is with a bad grace that the Anabaptists make the statement, seeing their system rests entirely upon inference or assumption.

In reply to the numerous historic facts which we have adduced to show the origin of the Antipedobaptists, and their peculiar tenet, our reviewer gives us the following: “Moshem says, ‘The true origin of that sect which acquired the denomination of the Anabaptists, . . . is hidden in the depths of antiquity,' &c."

To this our reply is brief. The origin of the Antipedobaptist denomination, or sect, we have traced to the German fanatics of the sixteenth century. If a denomination opposing infant baptism existed before that time, we call upon the Antipedobaptists to tell us when and where. Mr. Baxter long ago urged the same request, and defied any man to do so. And not only does he assert that such a denomination cannot be found, but he adds, "I think not one man." And many other great men, much more competent to judge than the humble author of the work under review, have given the same challenge; but in reply to all this, we are simply told that their "origin is hidden in the depths of antiquity!" I wonder that these poor fatherless children don't claim kindred to Melchisedek, seeing, that, like him, they are without father or mother, without descent! But, my friends, the historic fact remains a fact still. As Antipedobaptists, the German fanatics are your parents, whether you acknowledge them or not; and to be reduced to the necessity of disowning your parents, or of asserting that you have no known parentage, is certainly a very painful position. And it must be very gratifying to Pedobaptists to be able to trace their origin by a clear and honorable line to a parentage so noble—even to the inspired writers, and to the Father of the Spirits of all flesh, who commanded that the very same seal of the covenant that was applied to the parent, should be applied to the children of that parent, though the children, being only eight days old, were, of course, utterly incapable of exercising that faith which, on the part of the parent, was a necessary qualification. And this practice was continued and enforced by Divine authority till the seal was changed from circumcision to baptism. And let it be observed, that this is the only change that was made; the covenant, the promises, and the conditions being essentially the same. The covenant is still the covenant of grace; the promise is still "to you and to your children"; and the condition still is faith; and now, as before, the child is received into the covenant with the believing parent, and receives the seal accordingly. In a word, what belonged to Abraham and his seed, spiritually, to say the least, belongs to Christians and their seed; but to deny baptism to their children, is to deny this fact. Baptists try to evade this conclusion, by saying, "The promise is to you and to your adult children." But the text, or promise, does not so read; in fact, this is simply repeating that other promise, "Believe and thou shalt be saved," while the promise, to your children, is really excluded by this mode of interpretation. Still worse is the attempt to evade the force of that other passage where Paul represents the children of believers as being clean, evidently because they were consecrated to God in baptism, while those of unbelieving parents were not; for by nature, they certainly are alike. See Psalm li. 5, John iii. 6, Romans iii. 9, &c. Yet, for the purpose here specified, and at the risk of all consequences, Baptists would read, "legitimate" and "illegitimate"! We dare not venture strictures upon a construction so ridiculous ! But it is a painful fact that one error will, if not given up, drive men to other errors. We may be permitted to add just here, in view of what has been said, that, although we trace our practice to "the depths of antiquity," we do not find it hid there ; no, we find it there in legible characters, to be "known and read of all men !"

It will be remembered that I exposed the fallacy and terrible consequences of applying to infants what was evidently designed for adults only, consequences so terrible that in this way you would first starve to death, and then damn infants, and support all this by the Word of God ! The attempt of our reviewer to evade this reasoning, is truly a sorry one. In connection with much irrelevant talk about "the gospel commission," and about what Dr. Carson says about it, he gives us the following—the reader will please give it a name : "B. If they (infants) have nothing to do with the gospel of the commission, have they any thing to do with its ordinances ? A. Of course not ; for the gospel and its ordinances go together. So I think." In this way he attempts to prove that as children could not understand or believe a preached gospel, therefore, they have nothing to do with the gospel or its ordinances, and, consequently, cannot be saved ; for to be saved without the gospel is to be saved without Christ ! Thus, by this absurd reasoning, he brings down upon his theory the very consequences with which I charged it. Now, Mr. O. S., you know that the reasoning by which it is attempted to prove that infants should not be baptized, will prove with the very same conclusiveness that they should be starved to death, and that they will be damned; I say you know this. And you know, too, that to say that the disciples were not sent to preach to infants, and to say that infants have nothing to do with the gospel, are two different things. And you know equally well that infants are not disciplined by preaching the gospel to them, though you say so in the following words. Pretending to speak to your young convert, you say:

“Now will you turn Campbellite, and say they are to be disciplined by baptizing, or by preaching the gospel to them?”

“A. By preaching the gospel, of course.

“B. Then, of course, none are to be baptized till they are of sufficient age to be taught—they must be taught before they can believe, and must believe before they can receive the baptism of the commission—the only Christian baptism for us.”

You, know too, that all I have said on this subject is predicated of INFANTS, to whom the Gospel cannot be preached and who cannot possibly comply with any condition of salvation, and you know equally well that the seal that was applied to the believing parent was, by the command of the Almighty, applied to the INFANT child of that parent; nor can you deny that baptism is the seal of that same covenant of grace of which circumcision was the seal; and yet, ignoring or denying all this, you keep asserting that the seal cannot be applied till the recipient is qualified by instruction and faith, and you know, also, that God not only has not said what you say, but that he has said just the contrary! And you know, and cannot but know, that the arguments and facts adduced had reference to INFANTS, yet ignoring this, ever and anon you keep talking about instructed and believing children. Finally, while you constantly assert that instruction and faith are in every case an essential qualification before the seal of the covenant can be applied, you know that God taught, and his church practiced the contrary in the case of INFANTS from the days of Abraham; and you know that it was to meet and disprove this your ungrounded assertion that we adduced the fact that God commanded the seal to be applied to INFANTS, and the additional fact that he never repealed that law; yet you evade these facts and arguments and keep talking about something else. That baptism took the place of circumcision we have proved by other arguments, but whether this is admitted or denied, the fact remains the same, viz., that the infant was received into covenant relation with the believing parent, and received the seal of the covenant accordingly; so that all your talk about "unconscious babes" is simply a reflection upon the judgment of the Almighty in the case! If men are determined to oppose the baptism of infants they certainly should not base their opposition upon the fact that babes cannot believe. Mere deference to the judgment of the Almighty in the case should, one would think, be sufficient to prevent this. Baptists are evidently conscious of this, hence they try to evade or deny the very nature and design of circumcision, knowing, as they must, that a babe at eight days old was as unconscious formally as it is at that age now, as also that if that fact did not disqualify for circumcision it does not disqualify for baptism.

In addition to what we have already said to show how the Baptists attempt to evade or deny the facts here specified, we give the following from the third article of the series under consideration:

“A. But it seems to me according to Mr. L’s showing, we are still bound to circumcise male infants. He says until the Anabaptists can point to the positive annulment of the command to circumcise children, they are bound to do as we do; and if they still refuse to obey this confessedly unrepealed law of God, they do so at their own risk.”

In reply to all this it is only necessary to say that I never said so, and my reviewer knows I did not, as his remarks soon after sufficiently show. I said the command to apply to the infant the same sign and seal that was applied to the parent was never repealed, and if the Antipedobaptists repeal it they do so at their own risk. The reader will now see that this is much worse than mere evasion. He adds, “And all he has said upon this whole subject of signs and seals is a mass of confusion and nonsense.” Of this we are quite willing to leave the candid reader to judge, nor need we complain or be at all concerned in this matter, for it is upon Paul that this severe reflection falls, not upon us. See Heb. iv. 11. But not satisfied with this he denies that circumcision was the rite of initiation into the Jewish church, yea he denies, if we understand him right, the very existence of the Jewish Church, but hear him speak for himself:—

“Now that children were circumcised to initiate them into the church is simply untrue. If it is proper in any sense, to call the nation of Israel a church, infants were born members, and not circumcised to constitute them such.”

“Infants were born members” of what? of what did not exist? Truly this is “confusion worse confounded!” But if you do not like to be held to this marvelous blunder then you say infants were born members of the church, which is certainly granting all we claim, for if they were by their very birth members of the church, we should like to know by what authority Baptists refuse them the seal of the covenant, and even turn them out of church! Observe, too, that after all the talk about “unconscious babes,” it is here acknowledged that they were members of the church, were so by birth, and we should like to know upon what authority the children of Christian parents are deprived of the high privilege and right secured to the children of Jewish parents; especially as the ancient promise, “to thee and to thy seed,” made to Abraham, is repeated in the New Testament, and thus extended to the children of Christian parents in these words, “the promise is to you and to your children.” Certainly we must have higher authority than that of the German fanatics before we submit to have our children deprived of this “exceeding great and precious promise,” and turned out of the church as “aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenants of promise!”

“A. But did not Mr. L. prove that circumcision was a seal applied to infants at eight days’ old?”

“B. No, he did not prove that; he has asserted this in a very circuitous manner, as he has many other things; but of proof there is none. Circumcision is called a seal once, and but once, in all the Bible.”

Over against this marvelous assertion we simply set the following Scriptures to which the reader will please turn and read; Gen. xvii. 9-14, Rom. iv. 11. As this issue is clearly between the Baptists on the one hand, and the Old and New Testaments on the other, we, of course, leave our opponents to settle their quarrel with divine revelation, for we did not undertake to discuss the evidences of revelation. As we rest the point in dispute upon the plain text of Scripture we particularly request the reader to turn to the texts here specified, and to parallel passages: there it will be seen that our opponents contradict the express word of God, which shows that their case is truly desperate; and it will be seen, too, that circumcision is not only called a seal, but a sign and seal; yea, “a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised.” Observe, it was the sign and seal of the righteousness, or justification which he had by faith before he received that rite, so that circumcision was not the temporal, the political rite that our opponents say it was—being forced to this desperate remedy by the hopelessness of their bad cause. Observe, too, that the word which the apostle uses to designate that which Abraham had by faith, is the very same that he uses to designate that which the infant has unconditionally through Christ; that which through Christ “came upon all;” hence it is that the very same seal that was applied to the believing parent was, and is, applied to the infant children of that parent. See the word as it occurs in the original in chapters four and five of Romans.

It will be remembered that as Baptists assert that infant baptism is a novelty, a human invention, a popish invention, we appealed to the facts of history; not to prove the doctrine, as Mr. O. S. tells his readers, but to prove, in opposition to the above assertion, that the practice has been universal, and continuous from apostolic times until now, and that history does not record a single instance of its being opposed by any denomination of Christians till it was opposed by the German fanatics in the sixteenth century; and to this we demanded contradiction, if it could be contradicted, calling upon our opponents to tell us, if they could, when, where and by whom infant baptism was introduced; telling them, at the same time, when, where and by whom, antipedobaptism was introduced. To all this our reviewer gives the following reply:

“Suppose I ask Mr. L. when sponsors were first appointed—when praying for the dead first commenced—when infant communion was first introduced—and exorcism—unction, etc.? All he could do would be to say about the close of the second, or beginning of the third century. Now what I have to say, is, that infant baptism commenced at the same period with these other rites.”

is a sure example of infant baptism to be found."

Yes, sir, "Mr. L." could say, and he has already said a great deal more than this. See Chapter XI. of the work under review, to mention no more. But waiving all that might be said on that particular, as not being very important, we beg to remind our reviewer that, to make certain additions to a Christian institution, trifling at first, and wholly to do away with that institution, are very different things. The former might be done stealthily and by degrees, without much opposition or notice; not so the latter; hence the introduction of the Antipedobaptist dogma by the German fanatics, was distinctly marked and firmly, and almost universally opposed, as a novelty not to be tolerated. See our proofs of all this in Chapter XII. Our reviewer admits, it will be observed, in the above quotations, that infant baptism was practiced in the second, or in the beginning of the third century. And as for Professor Hahns, he cannot "find a sure example of infant baptism during the first hundred and fifty years." Very well, what does that prove? That others cannot find it practiced during that period? Certainly not. We have produced our witnesses to prove that it was practiced in, and from Apostolic times; and, surely, Professor Hahn's ignorance does not make null and void the positive testimony of Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Ambrose, Origin, Chrysostom, Augustine, and other fathers. See the chapters referred to above. To the testimony of individual fathers, may be added that of councils—the council of Carthage, for instance, at which Cyprian presided, in 254. See the decision of this council, quoted page 80. Now we think the testimony of those fathers and councils as to what they actually found, and positively asserted, is better than the testimony of Professor Hahn and others as to what they did not find. In other words, the knowledge of the former is better than the ignorance of the latter ! In short, we called upon Antipedobaptists to tell us when, where, and by whom infant baptism was introduced, and in answer they have given us the above : Why ? I answer, simply because they had nothing else to give, unless they would give us the truth ; viz., that infant baptism was introduced when infant circumcision was discontinued, and by the same authority ! Till they refute this position, we will let the above poor answer go for what it is worth ; that is, nothing at all, unless to prove that our position is unanswerable ! Meantime, we hope they will not again tell us that infant baptism is a popish invention, seeing they have now admitted the existence of the practice several hundred years before popery existed !

But our reviewer seeks help from Tertullian. Very unfortunately, we think, for his cause, he says : "Tertullian, one of the most eminent of the fathers of the second century, was the first to oppose infant baptism—hence it is supposed to have originated about his time." Again, "Dr. Barlow says Pedobaptism 'came into the world in the second century.'" After a diligent search, Pedobaptism is found in the second century, and Tertullian the first to oppose it, that is, less than one hundred years after the Apos-

bles' times ! Well, we are glad that we moved our Baptist friends to search after this thing, for they have made some important discoveries, and concessions too. It is now a conceded and settled fact that the baptism of infants was practiced in the second century, so that it is neither a novelty nor a popish invention, certain ! And "Tertullian was the first to oppose." Yea, and the last too, till the sixteenth century, for anything that has been shown to the contrary ! But what did Tertullian say ? Did he say that infant baptism did not take the place of infant circumcision ? No. Did he say that infant baptism was not practiced by the Apostles ? Did he say that it was forbidden by the Apostles, or that it was unscriptural ? No, nothing of the kind. Did he say that it was a novelty, that it was an innovation recently introduced ? No, he did not even intimate any thing of this kind. Well, did he tell us who introduced the practice, whether lately or at a more remote period ? No, no such statement is found in his writings which have come down to us. What then, did he say ? To this question, our reviewer gives no answer, for although he claims Tertullian as a supporter of his system, and appeals to him accordingly, he has not quoted a single word from his writings. So that we might let his appeal to this father go for what it is worth ; that is, nothing at all to the Antipedobaptists, though it is worth considerable to us, for it affords certain evidence that if Tertullian had said that infant baptism was a novelty, and antiscritural, they would certainly have produced such statements ; but they have given us no such quotations, for the best of all reasons; viz., there were none such to give! Hence we are simply told that he "was the first to oppose infant baptism," and that he was "one of the most eminent of the fathers of the second century." For what was this father eminent? We regret that our reviewer has not told us. This assertion, like many others, is entirely unsupported. In support of it he has not given us a single quotation from the writings of that father, from his contemporaries, or from any other source. In view of this, we may be permitted to add a few remarks to what we have already said regarding this eminent father.

What we have read concerning Tertullian, will, we think, fully justify us in saying that he was very erratic, and his judgment as a theologian entirely unreliable. He had much zeal, but it was not often according to knowledge. Hence we are told, after all his opposition to error and errorists, he embraced the pernicious opinions of the Montanists, whose founder was one Montanus, a Phrygian. The account that Bishop Hurd gives of this man and his followers, presents a dark picture. He claimed to be inspired, as did the two women associated with him, Priscilla and Maximilla, which three formed the original leaders of the sect. He claimed that the Holy Ghost had made known to him many things that had been concealed from the Apostles. Several councils condemned his teachings, and he and all his followers were excluded from the Christian Church. This sect sprang up in the days of Tertullian, and began to dwindle away toward the latter end of the fourth century. (See Bishop Hurd's History of Religions, page 159, edition of 1813.) So much for the eminence of this father, who is claimed as the advocate of Antipedobaptism, and the first opponent of infant baptism.

But still the question recurs, What did he say in opposition to infant baptism? We have heard what he did not say, now let us hear what he did say. He attempts to defend his peculiar view with regard to the baptism of children (I say his peculiar view, for I know not what name to give it) thus, "Give not that which is holy unto dogs, neither cast your pearls before swine.' 'Lay hands suddenly upon no man, neither be partakers of other men's faults.' Therefore, according to every one's condition and disposition, and also their age, the delaying of baptism is more profitable, especially in the case of little children. For what need is there that the godfathers should be brought into danger? because they may either fail of their promise by death, or they may be mistaken by a child's proving of wicked disposition." Again, "What need their guiltless age make such haste to the forgiveness of sins?" These particulars are extracted from the words of Tertullian, as given by Hibbard, in his Work on Baptism, pp. 190, 191. All the support that the opponents of infant baptism can obtain from such consummate nonsense, they are welcome to it! But the reader is requested to notice that he simply contends that the DELAYING of baptism, according to every one's condition, disposition, and age, and especially in the case of children, IS MORE PROFITABLE! Evidently a mere whim of his own, and as evidently a very different whim from that of modern Antipedobaptists. He would defer baptism in the case of adults as well as in the case of infants. And why? Not because he claimed it to be unscriptural in either case, but because he considered it "more profitable." Where the infant was likely to die, however, he recommended, or advised, that it should be baptized without delay. His words as given by Watson, are, if their lives be in danger. It should be observed, too, that Tertullian merely gives us his judgment, and attempts to support it by his reasoning as above. But his judgment is evidently unreliable, and his reasoning driveling nonsense. If it were, his testimony with regard to whether infant baptism were an innovation of modern date, would have weight, but his mere judgment, as given in this case, and utterly unsupported by either Scripture or history, yea, contradicted by both, is, of course, utterly unworthy of notice. In such a case, the mere opinion of the best of the fathers would be without weight, for we know the wisest of them erred, or was liable to err, in such matters, when not guided by the Word of God. What Mr. Watson says with regard to the opinion of Tertullian in this matter, is a key to the whole secret: "The whole of this is solved by adverting to that notion of the efficiency of this sacrament in taking away all previous sins, which then began to prevail, so that an inducement was held out for delaying baptism as long as possible, till at length, in many cases, it was postponed to the article of death, under the belief that the dying who received this sacrament were the more secure of salvation." Institutes, Vol. II., page 645.

We are strongly inclined to believe that in this whim of Tertullian, may be found the germ of that popish dogma, that the sacraments confer grace ex opere operato, and probably the dogma of extreme unction, which is to be administered just before death, took its rise in this same silly conception of Tertullian.

Once more, and we will take our leave of this antipedo, anti-adult Baptist, or Baptist-delayer, or what you please to call him. Tertullian, we are told, was made presbyter of the Church at Carthage, about the year A. D. 192, and the council at which the subject of infant baptism was discussed, was held in that same city, A. D. 254. At this council sixty-six bishops were present, when this same subject of delaying, or not delaying the baptism of infants, was brought up in the way we before stated. There was not a word as to whether infants should be baptized, but simply as to whether it was necessary to delay their baptism till the eighth day, as in the case of circumcision, and the unanimous decision of the council was, "that it was not necessary to defer baptism to that day, and that the grace of God, or baptism, should be given to all, and especially to infants!" Cyprian, the presiding bishop, in communicating this decision to Fidus, the absent inquirer, says, "It was unanimously decreed." Just so little was Antipedobaptism known in those days, and so little were Tertullian and his nation remembered, even in his own city, only a few years after his death! It was to bring out this last fact, that I again referred to the decision of this council. The historic fact I quote from Watson's Institutes, Vol. II., page 645. The system that seeks support from such a notion of such a man, in opposition to such an array of testimony from councils and fathers, right in the place of, and at the time the notion was mooted, must certainly be in great need of support. Oh, why will men persist in attempting to defend what is evidently indefensible? If infant baptism had been an innovation of recent date, and, consequently, only limitedly practiced, it is evident Tertullian would have said so, and equally evident that this council, in the face of such facts, never could have decided as it did. And if it was not an innovation of recent date, then it was the practice of apostolic times!

As I have referred to the decision of the Council at Carthage, with regard to the baptism of infants, and as that decision shows beyond the possibility of mistake what the views and practice of the primitive Church were, I will here give an extract from the letter of Bishop Cyprian, who presided at that Council. I quote from Lord King, giving his own introductory and closing remarks:

“To these testimonies of Origen, I might also add those of Irenæus, lib. 11, cap. 39, p. 137, and of Cyprian De Lapsis, § 7, p. 279. But I shall choose to waive them because I would willingly translate at length the determination of an African synod, held anno 254, whereat were present threescore and six bishops, the occasion of which determination was this: A certain bishop, called Fidus, had some scruples, not concerning the baptism of infants, but concerning the time of their baptism, whether they might be baptized before the second or third day after their birth, or before the eighth day, as it was observed with respect to circumcision under the Mosaical economy ; the reasons or grounds for which, his scruples, he proposed to this synod, who, having seriously examined them, unanimously decreed that children's baptism was not to be deferred so long, but that the grace of God or baptism should be given to all, and most especially unto infants, which synodical decree, because so pertinent to my purpose, I have at large transcribed as follows :

“ ‘ As for the matter of infants, who, you said, were not to be baptized within the second or third day after their nativity, or according to the laws of circumcision, within the eighth day thereof, it hath appeared to us in our council quite contrary ; no one maintained your opinion, but we all judged, that the mercy and grace of God was to be denied to no man. . . . And whereas the carnal Jewish circumcision was performed on the eighth day, that was a type and shadow of some future good thing, which Christ, the truth, being now come, is done away ; because the eighth day, or the first day after the Sabbath, was to be the day on which our Lord should rise and quicken us, and give us the spiritual circumcision ; therefore was the carnal circumcision on the eighth day, which type is now abolished, Christ, the truth, being come, and having given us the spiritual circumcision. Wherefore it is our judgment, that no one ought to be debarred from God's grace by that law, or that the spiritual circumcision should be hindered by the carnal one ; but all men ought to be admitted to the grace of Christ, as Peter sayeth in the Acts of the Apostles, that the Lord said unto him, that he should call no man common or unclean.

“ ‘But if any thing can hinder men from baptism, it will be heinous sins that will debar the adult and mature therefrom ; and if those who have sinned extremely against God, yet if afterward they believe, are baptized, and no man is prohibited from this grace, how much more ought not an infant to be prohibited, who, being but just born, is guilty of no sin, but of original, which he contracted from Adam ? who ought the more readily to be received to the remission of sins, because not his own, but others’ sins are remitted to him. Wherefore, dearly beloved, it is our opinion, that from baptism, and the grace of God, who is merciful, kind, and benign to all, none ought to be prohibited by us, which, as it is to be observed and followed with respect to all, so especially with respect to infants, and those that are but just born, who deserve our help, and the divine mercy, because at the first instant of their nativity, they beg it by their cries and tears.’ ”

“ So that here is as formal a synodical decree for the baptism of infants, as possibly can be expected, which, being the judgment of a synod, is more authentic and cogent than that of a private father, it being supposable that a private father might write his own particular judgment and opinion, but the determination of a synod or council denotes the common practice and usage of the whole Church.”

With such testimony before us, to the practice of the primitive Church, we may safely, with Lord King, “waive” the testimony of individual fathers. The facts recorded in the deliberations of this council, are decisive of the whole question. Antipedobaptism is certainly a novelty !

We give the following singular criticism from our reviewer, being entirely willing that his cause should have all the help that it is calculated to afford it :

“Mr. L. says—‘Irenæus speaks of the baptism of infants, little ones, and children.’ It is well Mr. L. forgot where this is found. Baumgarten Crusius says: ‘The celebrated passage in Irenæus is not to be applied to infant baptism; for the phrase renasci per eum (i. e. Christum) in Deum, evidently means the participation of all in his divine and holy nature, in which he became a substitute for all.’”

For the satisfaction of our reviewer, and that of all concerned, we give the following from Taylor, who quotes the Latin of Irenæus, and translates as follows: “Sanctifying every several age by the likeness it has to him, for he came to save ALL by himself. ALL, who by him are re-born to God; INFANTS, and LITTLE ONES, CHILDREN and YOUTHS, and persons of mature age.” The points to be noticed in this quotation from Irenæus, are, first, the classification: “Infants, little ones, children, youths, and persons of mature age”; second, that Christ is represented as saving all these five classes; third, that infants, as well as the other four classes, are said to be saved, sanctified, re-born, or regenerated; and that the sanctification and regeneration here predicated of infants, meant, or included, their baptism, according with these words of Jesus, “born of water,” “born of the Spirit.” Be this as it may, it is quite certain that Irenæus includes infants, with the other four classes in the church, as the saved and sanctified of the Lord Jesus ; and this is sufficient, for this being the fact, we may well say with the Apostle, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized," who are saved and sanctified as well as us? Certainly Irenæus, while holding these views, could never forbid their baptism; indeed, it was by baptism that they were sanctified or consecrated to God, and it is quite certain that they were not sanctified and saved, on condition of their believing; for infants, as here distinguished from the other four classes, were evidently incapable of believing. It will be observed, of course, that we do not quote Irenæus as competent to decide whether infants should be baptized, but only as bearing testimony to the belief and practice of the times.

Speaking of Irenæus as the disciple of Polycarp, who was the disciple of the apostle John, Mr. Taylor has the following reflections upon the above words of this ancient father—" Infants, little ones, children, are reborn unto God, by him, sanctified by him, says the 'Faithful Man,' recording his testimony for the benefit of "others also." The Law shall never triumph over the Gospel in its tenderness for infants. Does it describe little ones entering into covenant with God? Does it allow little children to enter the sacred precincts and partake of the most holy rites? Does it register them at their early age as members of the holy community 'among the living in Jerusalem?' Does it sanctify them to the Lord as Samuel was sanctified? So does the Gospel. 'HE came to save

ALL by himself; '—'Infants, little ones, children, youths, and seniors;' so says the reverend disciple; so says the Apostolic Master, and so says the DIVINE LORD—WHO DARE GAINSAY IT?"

For my part I more than ever bless and trust that Almighty Savior who saves infants, little ones, children youths, and persons of mature age, even ALL, "From the least to the greatest!" And with the council of Carthage I believe "that the grace of God, or baptism should be given to all, and ESPECIALLY to infants." For saying, and I think proving, that the infant's claim to baptism was clearer than that of any adult, my reviewer seemed much displeased, and charged me with braggadocio; he may now extend the epithet to the council of Carthage, the sixty-six bishops, who asserted the same thing, where Tertullian mooted his novel and silly opinion, and almost at the same time! To prevent mistake, and misrepresentation, we again call attention to the fact that we do not refer to a council any more than to an individual, as affording authority in such matters, but as bearing testimony to the belief and practice of their times and the times preceding them.

In my remarks on the history of the jailer's conversion and baptism, I made some criticisms upon the Greek words oikos and oikia, and in support of my position quoted at some length from Taylor's Facts and Evidences; the whole may be seen in the work under review, from p. 118 to p. 127. In his fourth article, which is the last in the dialogue form, Mr. O. S. glances at this part of the work, and, as usual, soon concludes as though he had conquered every opponent, and annihilated every argument. Although he has not entered into anything like an investigation of the subject, nor even attempted anything like a well digested argument, we have concluded to notice what he has offered as argument.

He says, "As nearly as I can understand Mr. L. he means that oikos means the children and oikia the servants or slaves." That you do not understand is quite evident, if one may judge from the above; but be that as it may, it is quite certain we are not fairly represented. Though oikia may include the family with the servants, and the entire establishment, oikos does not include the servants, but the family only; and sometimes it is used to designate the family residence as distinguished from other buildings in the establishment, while oikia may include with such buildings the oikos, or family residence, also.

In addition to what we have already given from Taylor, as explanatory of his position, and as explanatory of our own position on this subject, we now give the following from the facts and evidences.

After pointing out numerous instances wherein the sacred writers distinguished these two words as of different import, our author says, "With all these distinctions and diametrical oppositions, are these terms interchangeable in their proper acceptation? . . . .Is the careful distinction preserved by the evangelists, the merely casual result of accident? But oikos is a masculine noun, while oikia is feminine. How long have nouns, masculine and feminine, been interchangeable in Greek? Are prince, princess, Jew, Jewess, tiger, tigress, &c., interchangeable in English? That they denote the same genus and species, is certain, but as terms in language, they are not interchangeable. Neither can a part be the same as the whole, or be interchangeable with it. That oikos really is a part of oikia, is the testimony of Hesychius, and of Biel repeating him," page 32. Again, "It is proper to advert again specifically to these terms in connection with infant baptism. Aristotle says that oikia means both 'bond and free.' One passage of Scripture afforded the most proper opportunity to include a servant in the term family, John viii. 35: 'The SERVANT abideth not in the oikia forever, but the son abideth ever.' Thus the son is a member of the oikia, but the servant is not a member of the oikos. When oikos is used to denote a family, the connection of numbers with the term forms the experimentum crucis of the distinction between the family, oikos and oikia, the entire establishment, including the servants. We read of the oikos, family of Noah, consisting of eight persons, being saved in the ark; here servants are evidently excluded. Genesis vii. 1; 2 Peter iii. 21. So we read of the whole oikos—family of Jacob, that went down into Egypt with him, being sixty-six persons. Genesis xlv. 26. The servants are excluded, for they amounted to some hundreds. Ahab had seventy sons in Samaria—look out the best, and fight for your master's family—oikos. That the seventy express infants by the term oikos, appears from the following instances: Genesis xviii. 19; Genesis xxxiv. 30; Numbers xviii. 91; Deuteronomy xii. 7, xv. 20; Deuteronomy xiv. 26; Deuteronomy xxv. 9; 1 Samuel ii. 33;

2 Samuel vii. 16, 18, 25, 27, 29 ; 1 Chronicles xvii. 23, 25 ; Psalm exiii. 9. When Jacob was going down into Egypt, the sacred writer informs us that the number of his sons and his sons' sons, of his daughters and his son's daughters, with him, was sixty-six. He then mentions particularly the two souls born to Joseph in Egypt, who were infants, and closes by saying, 'All the souls of the house, oikos, of Jacob, were threescore and ten.' The phrase 'all the house,' is evidently inapplicable till these two infants of Joseph are INCLUDED. Omit these, the term does not apply ; insert them, the term is instantly and correctly applied. The term, therefore, EXPRESSES the presence of those INFANTS. Without those infants the number cannot be made up. The sacred writer waits to express them ; and then all the house is the suitable phrase. This passage is demonstrative of the presence of infants, in the term oikos ; not merely morally or grammatically, but by means of the numbers, mathematically and strictly demonstrative. The infants are here expressed in the term, all the house. Neither fraud nor force can eject them." These are but a very few of the texts quoted by this learned author, to demonstrate and fix the meaning of these words, oikos and oikia.

To corroborate the above criticisms, and to exclude even the possibility of misunderstanding our view with regard to this particular, we give the following criticism of Dr. A. Clarke, on the Hebrew word beith, answering to the Greek word oikos : "In the Hebrew language, beith signifies both a house and a family ; ben a son ; bath a daughter ; and eben a stone. Of all these nouns, banah, he built, is, I believe, the common root. Now as beith, a house, is built of abanim, stones, hence banah, he built, is a proper radix for the stones and building; and as beith, a family (Psalm lxxviii. 6), is constituted or made up of banim, sons, and banoth, daughters, hence the same root banah, he built, is common to all; for sons and daughters build up or constitute a family, as stones do a building." So exactly is the Hebrew word beith, translated by the Greek word oikos; and so accurate, fixed and expressive, is the meaning of each word, that to exclude infants from either, is to exclude them from both the natural and the spiritual family, and do the utmost violence, both to language and truth! See Clarke's Commentary, 1 Peter ii. 5.

Speaking of the fact that the sacred writers use the words oikos and oikia to convey distinct ideas, and of the additional fact that oikos is used as including infants, Mr. Taylor says, "The more learned Baptists now confess that INFANTS are included in the term OIKOS, family, as used in the New Testament; while it is curious to observe the difficulties to which those are reduced who contend that infants are excluded from the term family, and that the word must be restricted to adults. If our translators had employed the term FAMILY instead of the words house and household, the sect of Baptists never would have existed!"

We are now prepared to notice the texts adduced by our reviewer, to prove that oikos and oikia are of synonymous import, and that the sacred writers use them interchangeably. In support of this position, the following texts are quoted: 1 Corinthians i. 16, and xvi. 15. In the former text Paul says he "baptized the oikos of Stephanus;" in the latter he speaks of the whole household as being the first-fruits of Achaia, and as having "addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints." Here, therefore, he uses the word oikia, because the particulars here specified were true of the whole oikia, while he, Paul, only baptized the oikos. Hence so far are these texts from proving that these words are used synonymously, that they prove the very reverse; and for this purpose Taylor quotes them. The next texts quoted are Luke viii. 41 and 51. In verse 41 we are told that "Jairus besought Jesus that he would come into his oikos;" and in verse 51, we read, "and when he came into the oikia, he suffered no man to go in" to the family residence proper, where the lately deceased daughter lay. Now it is evident that Luke here makes a distinction between oikos and oikia, for, to say nothing of his inspiration, Luke was a scholar, and it would be highly improper to represent him as saying, "When he came into the oikos he suffered no man to go into the oikos!" Yet our reviewer must so read it to make the text favor his position. Luke, however, uses the word oikia to designate the outer court, or place, beyond which "the multitude" were not allowed to accompany Jesus. Here he took Peter, James, John, and the father and mother of the maiden, and passing from the oikia, he, with this select party, entered the oikos where the dead body lay. Thus it was that he complied with the request of Jairus, who said, "Come into my oikos," not my oikia, where the multitude might, and did come, but were not permitted to enter the oikos. Hence this text also proves just the reverse of that for which our reviewer quotes it. The next text produced is Luke x. 5 and 7. In the last text quoted, the distinction was between what was, and what was not, the oikos, or family residence proper; here the distinction is between the house, or dwelling, of whatever kind, and the family occupying it. Hence the disciples are said to enter the oikia and invoke blessings upon the oikos, the family dwelling in it, for it would not be proper to invoke blessing upon the house, or place of abode, rather than upon the occupants thereof. A person who only entered the outer court of an oriental residence, would be said to enter the oikia, but he would not say, peace be upon this oikia, but upon this oikos.

These are all the passages presented by our reviewer in support of his position; viz., that oikos and oikia always mean the same thing; but even these passages prove just the reverse! To us, indeed, it seems utterly incredible to suppose that the sacred writers would ever and anon change one word for the other, when there was no change in the sense. In conclusion, we will simply add, that, although the doctrine of infant baptism is abundantly established without the help which is derived from a right understanding of these two Greek words, yet, believing the interpretation here given to be the right interpretation, we thought it might serve the cause of truth to defend it.

The only remaining particular worthy of notice, in this article, is the following: "Infant baptism can not be traced higher than the middle of the second century, and even then, it was not universal." Here it is conceded that infant baptism was all but universal some fifty years after the death of the Apostle John, and while it is assumed that some did not then practice it, no one can tell who, or where they were, nor can one council, church, or individual be specified as having opposed the practice as being unscriptural; nor did the German fanatics do so, for they despised the Scriptures, and claimed to have had their teaching by a late revelation; nay, one of their leaders said, "I am the beginning of baptism." He who can believe that such an innovation could become all but universal some fifty years after the death of the Apostle John, and that without known opposition, yea, without knowing when, where, or by whom it commenced, cannot be said to be an intelligent believer; and to require any man to believe this, is to require him to believe what is utterly unreasonable! Let them believe it who can, I cannot. At any rate, we hope such believers will not again tell us that infant baptism is a popish invention!

Our reviewer is now evidently exhausted and irritated. His next article is characterized by personalities, repetitions, assertions, and contradiction. For instance, he now says infant baptism "cannot be traced to within two or three centuries of the planting of the Christian Church." In the previous article, it will be remembered, he found the practice almost universal in "the middle of the second century !” He tells us, too, that Chrysostom complained that most persons neglected to baptize their children, and that “Jerome speaks of those who refused to give baptism to their children.” Yes, and they might have told us of many who neglected their own salvation, as well as that of their children ; neglected the sacrament of the supper, as well as that of baptism ; and positively and knowingly disobeyed God in many other ways, and yet did not deny that God in his word enjoined what they neglected or refused. Nor is it any better now. Such characters are still to be found in abundance, and, in consequence hereof, good men still complain, as did Chrysostom and Jerome. So that here is nothing against our position, but much in favor of it, if those fathers complained as here stated.

I said I believed history did not furnish an instance of a single society of Christians having opposed infant baptism as being unscriptural, or even of one individual doing so, till it was done by the German fanatics of the sixteenth century. I also quoted Mr. Baxter, who asserts the same thing. In reply to all this, our reviewer gives the following pointed reply :

“The state of that man’s heart and conscience, who can make such statements—and make them in the face of known facts—is not very enviable, to say the least. Mr. Baxter we may excuse ; he may never have informed himself as to what writers had said previous to the time he specifies, and so have been honest and truthful in his statement ; (!) but not so Mr. Levington, who mentions Tertullian, a warm opposer.”

No, sir; Mr. L. did not say, or believe, that even Tertullian was an exception, for I do not find that he ever opposed infant baptism as being unscriptural; hence we recognize his peculiar teaching with regard to infant baptism as favoring our position, for we think he would have said that the practice was unscriptural if he had so believed, and we think he would have said that it was a novelty if that had been the fact; but he has not said either one or the other; hence my heart may not be quite as bad as you represent it to be! On the other hand, you do us too much honor when you represent us as being better informed than Mr. Baxter, that is really too much of a good thing! Moreover, you, too, fail to find in history such an instance of opposition to infant baptism as that which I said could not be found; yes, sir, you have utterly failed to produce a single instance. Hence we must still leave the origin of YOUR KIND of opposition to infant baptism, where we before left it; viz., WITH THE GERMAN FANATICS!

In his next article we find our reviewer makes another attempt to find the first Antipedobaptist Society, or individual, so long sought for. The attempt is singular. He commences thus, "John the Revelator says, Chap. xii. 6—'And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she had a place prepared of God.'" The argument which he attempts to adduce from this text is briefly this; the Antipedobaptist Church being the true church, the "pure secession," and she being "obliged to flee into the wilderness to hide from persecution, and thus perpetuate her existence," it becomes difficult to find the first Antipedobaptist Society, it being, in this way, "hid in the depths of antiquity!" Still, however, he seems to think that the search is not quite a hopeless one; hence he proceeds thus, being determined to find the first Antipedobaptist Society—"But who were the 'Pure Secession?' Who fled into the wilderness? They were the Novatians—the Donatists, or Puritans, as they were sometimes called." In proof of this he adds, amongst other things, the following: "And 'Fuller, the English church historian, asserts, that the Baptists in England, in his days, were the Donatists new dipped,' while Robinson declares they were Trinitarian Anabaptists." Really our Antipedobaptist friends seem to have hard work to find their parents, and they seem ready to acknowledge as such almost any one rather than confess their true parents, the German fanatics; nay, they would even prefer to remain without any known parents; and we can sympathize with them in their extreme difficulty, but we cannot help them, for they must acknowledge these same German Antipedobaptists as their parents, or go without any! True they may adopt others, but they will not be their true parents, they will only be adopted parents at the best, who, if they were living, would not acknowledge them for their children!

But let us now make some inquiry with regard to these newly-adopted parents, the Novatians and the Donatists. "The Novatians," says Bishop Hurd, "were a numerous sect of heretics, who sprang up about the middle of the third century, and were so called from one Novatian, a presbyter at Rome.

Cornelius having been elected bishop, Novatian was so enraged that himself had not been preferred that he endeavored to blacken the character of Cornelius, by charging him with showing too much lenity to those who had apostatized during the persecution. . . . Nay, he went so far as to assert, that an apostate never could be forgiven throughout all eternity; which so terrified those who had lapsed, that they returned again to paganism. He was equally severe to those who married a second time, declaring them guilty of the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost." He also says, "They re-baptized all such of the orthodox as joined their party." He adds, finally, "but they are not mentioned after the middle of the fifth century." Lord King finds Novatian at Rome, A. D. 252.

Now let us inquire after the other adopted parent, or ancestor, of our modern Antipedobaptists, Mr. Donatus. Of this man and his followers we furnish the following particulars from Bishop Hurd.

"Another numerous sect of heretics who made a great figure in the world, particularly in Africa, where they flourished many years, were called Donatists, and took their first rise about the beginning of the fourth century, a few years before Constantine the Great ascended the throne.

"Donatus, their founder, was a Numidian bishop, but being a man of a turbulent disposition, he was hated by his people, which induced him to seek an opportunity of leaving them, and settling in some other place. Just about that time the Bishop of Carthage died, and as there was to be a fresh election, he offered himself a candidate. But the people having had an account of his character transmitted to them, he was unanimously rejected; and his own people having chosen another bishop, his passions were so much irritated, that he resolved to separate himself from the Catholic Church. ....As this heretic, like all others of the same character, had separated himself from the orthodox church, so he taught that baptism administered by any but those of his own party was invalid. In this he was much countenanced by some disputes which had taken place in the church about fifty years before he made his appearance. It had been agitated in several councils or synods, that the person baptized by a heretic must be re-baptized, but the orthodox party always opposed this notion. And there being at that time many persons in Africa who were not well grounded in the principles of religion, they greedily embraced this doctrine, and in consequence thereof the Donatists became extremely powerful....They excommunicated all the orthodox as heretics who had denied the faith; and taking advantage of the troubles which then reigned in Africa, they were so audacious as to put those to death who differed from them in sentiments.... In this manner they continued to flourish longer than any sect we have hitherto mentioned; for we have some instances of their existence so late as the seventh century.....At last they were swallowed up in that flood of errors which overspread the Romish Church." Speaking of the Circumcellians our historian says, "Soon after the Donatists had established churches and ordained bishops in Africa, a new sect sprung up among those heretics, called Circumcellians, and they were the most horrid of any we have yet mentioned. They had no fixed abode, but rambled up and down the provinces begging or rather exacting a support from the people in the country. They exercised all sorts of cruelty, and treated every one they met with in the most brutal manner. .... They proceeded so far as to lay violent hands on themselves, in hopes of obtaining the crown of martyrdom. This they did several ways, but the most common was, by throwing themselves down from precipices, drowning themselves in rivers, or burning themselves to death. They never hanged themselves, because Judas took that method of destroying himself." Concerning these "madmen," as the doctor calls them, numerous other particulars are recorded, many of which are taken from the ecclesiastical historian, Theodoret. As a kind of episode we give the following: "A company of Circumcellians met a young man of wit and courage, and presenting him with a sword, ordered him to plunge it into their hearts (it was common for them to beg others to kill them), or they would put him to immediate death. He did not refuse, but told them, that perhaps when he had killed a few of them, the others would repent and fall upon and dispatch him; hence, he begged they would first suffer him to bind their hands and feet, and then he would do as they desired. They consented to this and suffered themselves to be bound, which was no sooner done, than the young man lashed them all with a whip, left them, and went away." See Hurd's History of Religions, published by J. Gleave, Manchester, I think, 1813; the title page with date, is gone. Pp. 152, 155, 158. Our reviewer also mentions the Paulicians and the Paterines, as being among the ancestors of the Antipedobaptists; but as he quotes no authority in support of what he says concerning them, and we are entirely ignorant of them, we must leave them with him for what they are worth.

It is only necessary to make a very few remarks with regard to these newly-adopted parents of the Antipedobaptists. And, first, as it is admitted that the practice of infant baptism was all but universal about the middle of the second century, it will be seen that Novatian did not exist till about one hundred years after; while Donatus did not exist till about one hundred and fifty years after; hence, according to the showing of our reviewer, the practice of infant baptism was all but universal at least one hundred years before the parents of Antipedobaptism had an existence! Second, history does not show that Novatian, Donatus, or their followers, ever once objected to infant baptism; at least, the history that I have read, does not, though it gives all other particulars concerning them; nor does it record a word of controversy with regard to their mode of baptism; nor does it say what their mode of baptism was; nor does our reviewer quote a word of history with regard to these particulars; so that these heretics and their followers afford no help to the Antipedobaptists. To the Anabaptists they seem to afford some help, but in reality they do not; for although they re-baptized their proselytes, as do their professed followers of the present day, yet it was not because they objected to the mode of their former baptism, but because they did not recognize the orthodox, or any others, as having any right to baptize, claiming, as they did, that themselves, and themselves only, were the church. But this preposterous dogma was evidently adopted to gain proselytes and build up their party; and in this we acknowledge their resemblance to modern Anabaptists! Now, when in connection herewith, we consider the other absurdities which they held, together with their origin, character and end, we think it would have been quite as honorable if our Antipedobaptist friends had acknowledged their true ancestors, Munzer, Grebel, Blaurock and company. At any rate, they are welcome to all the support that they can obtain from Novatian, Donatus and their followers. And still the question remains unanswered. If there was an Antipedobaptist society before the German fanatics, please tell us when, where and who! And it is quite certain, that on this Western Continent there was no Anabaptist Church till Ezekiel Holliman, a layman, plunged Roger Williams, after which Roger plunged Ezekiel and several others. Now we have only to say, that for this people, with these showings, to claim, as they do, that they are the only Church, is, to say the very least, simply ridiculous.

I have carefully read the two remaining articles, and, strange as it may appear, I find nothing that deserves notice here. The writer seems perfectly exhausted, and much out of temper withal. Hence we have repetition and assertion in abundance, together with much irrelevant matter, and not a little small talk, which, it will be remembered, I promised not to notice.

It will be seen that our reviewer has even passed unnoticed those parts of the work in which, more especially, I assail, and, it is believed, overturn, the very foundations upon which his system rests; or, if he has noticed them, his remarks, for the most part, are either irrelevant or trifling. For instance, let any one read Chapters III., IV., V., VIII. and IX., and then look at the review and see what is said in reply; or, rather, see how these chapters are passed by! Nor has he attempted to meet the arguments which I employ to show that it is simply impossible to plunge under water all persons, in all countries, seasons and climates. He has not so much as attempted to prove the thing to be right, humane, practicable, and God-like! And no marvel, he dare not! Why then represent God Almighty as absolutely enjoining that which implies all this?

Finally, it may be well to notice one more statement which Antipedobaptists frequently make with an air of triumph; viz., this, "We will have no inference, give us a positive command." Now, although our position does not depend upon inference for support, we beg to say that no man can declare the whole counsel of God, or even understand it, without inference. Nay, more; we do not hesitate to say that necessary inference, both in religion and in other matters, is sometimes more conclusive and convincing to the human mind than is a mere statement of the truth! To show, however, that inference is not only right, but even unavoidable, a few remarks will be entirely sufficient. For instance; the offer of liberty implies the bondage of the party to whom such offer is made; the offer of pardon implies the guilt and condemnation of the party to whom that offer is made; the offer of life implies the death of the party to whom such offer is made; the offer of eyesight implies blindness; the offer of instruction implies ignorance; the offer of cleansing implies impurity; the offer of strength implies weakness; the offer of mercy implies unworthiness; the offer of a free gift implies that the recipient thereof has not merited, or given an equivalent for that free gift; and refuge intelligently offered implies the exposure of the party to whom it is offered. In all these, and in numerous other instances, the inference is legitimate and necessary. Nor will it do to plead the importance of a doctrine or practice, as making it an exception to this rule; for if the inference is a necessary one, that fact remains the same, whether the thing inferred be of great or of little importance! Moreover, some of the greatest doctrines in the Bible are presented to us as being necessarily inferred. For instance; the doctrine of a separate state, of a future state of life and happiness, is thus presented to us by our blessed Lord, who infers the happy existence of Abraham from the declaration, "I am the God of Abraham," for, he adds, "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." And he adopts this method, rather than that of simply declaring the fact, for the conviction of the infidel Sadducees. In like manner, Paul infers the death of universal mankind, from the fact that Christ died for all; for, says he, "We thus judge," or infer, "that if one died for all, then were all dead." It is folly, then, and worse than folly, to say, "We will have no inference!"

But above all people, it ill becomes the Anabaptists to say, "We will have no inference," for, as we have shown, their whole system rests upon mere inference; they cannot produce one clear text, much less a thus sayeth the Lord. And yet, though they are wholly depending upon inference for the very existence of their system, they are ever and anon crying out, "We will have no inference!" Just as well might they tell us that they will have no fact, for inference frequently has all the certainty of fact; for instance, if it is certain that there is now an Antipedobaptist society, it is equally certain that that society had a beginning, or that it is from everlasting. Now it is evident that this inference comes to us with all the certainty of the fact from which it is derived. Again, If an Antipedobaptist society now exists, and no such society existed before that of the German fanatics, but has existed ever since, it follows that the latter is the offspring of the former. To admit the fact, and yet deny the necessary inference, is folly, for the one is as certain as the other. In short, you might as well say we will have no fact, as say we will have no inference! We hope, therefore, that self-respect, if nothing else, will induce Anabaptists and others to discontinue the silly statement, "We will have no inference," for it is equal to saying, we will have no logic, no reasoning, no judgment, no wisdom, no facts; yea, and no intelligent practice, for what is right practice, or wisdom, but the right use of knowledge; in other words, the right inference drawn from the facts admitted. We do not hesitate to say that inference is essential to our very existence! For instance; I am sleepy, I infer I should sleep; I am weary, I infer I should rest; I am hungry, I infer I should eat; I am thirsty, I infer I should drink; and I sleep, rest, eat and drink accordingly, and if I do not thus infer and act, I shall die, that is all! Just so necessary is inference to the continuance of natural life. And it is equally necessary to the continued existence of the Antipedobaptist, or Anabaptist denomination; for their whole system, as we have shown, rests, or depends, upon inference. Therefore, they are the last people who should say, "We will have no inference!" Nor would we object if their inferences were necessarily drawn from appropriate facts or principles. But, alas! this is far from being the case; for their inferences, upon which they rest their mode of baptism, and that by which they claim to be the only church, as also that by which they exclude infants from Christian baptism, are so far from being necessarily drawn, that they are entirely illegitimate, as we have abundantly proved. Indeed, sometimes the inference is drawn from an inference, and both without warrant or plausibility. For instance, they assume, for it is not proved, that John and Philip went into the water; and from this they infer that the parties baptized by them were plunged under the water; and from this they again infer that no one is baptized that is not plunged under the water, and then they cry out, "We will have no inference!"

Again. Philip said to "a man of Ethiopia," "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest be baptized," and Jesus said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned"; and from this they infer that the infant, as well as the Ethiopian, and those to whom the Gospel is preached, must also believe or remain unbaptized; and with equal propriety they might infer that it must believe or be damned! And after thus inferring, they again cry out, "We will have no inference!" Once more. They say we were plunged under water, and from this they infer that they only were baptized; and from this last inference they again infer that they only are the church, and beside them there is no Church of God upon the earth! And again they cry out, "We will have no inference!" And there we leave them alone in their glory.
